In the first place, St. Paul, I do not quite get your idea on the long point. You might have a long point in starting, but the current will shape the point after its own idea afterwards. Of course the less point you have on the lower carbon the less light interference there will be, but if the point be too small and long, it will instantly set up such a high resistance that it will burn away, or else there will be, I think, heavy flaming. I do not quite know what to say about the high amperage proposition. I have always held that while there is some gain after d. c. amperage passes 45, it is exceedingly expensive, since after the crater becomes, say ⅜ of an inch across, the lens system will only absorb a comparatively small percentage of light emanating from a crater of such large diameter. In this connection you must understand, St. Paul, that the ideal light to be used in conjunction with a lens is but a pin-point in size, and that the larger the source of light becomes, the less proportionate amount of it will be utilized by the lens, or at least that is my understanding of the matter. If I am wrong, I shall be glad to be set right, but it will have to be shown to me that it is advisable to use more than 50 amperes d. c., save in exceptional cases where one can afford to have added illumination at the cost of very great waste.

Now, St. Paul, I do not make all this as a dogmatic can't-be-wrong statement. I should like to see this matter discussed by department fans. Undoubtedly the proportionate loss of light does increase as the size of the crater increases. Perhaps by discussing this matter, and experimenting, we can between us, arrive at some idea of what the economically practical limit of d. c. amperage is. I have always held it to be between 45 and 50 amperes; meaning by this that above that limit waste becomes excessive.

No, brother, you are not intruding. Nobody intrudes, or can intrude, in this department, because I won't let 'em. If your letter appears in print you can gamble that the editor for some reason or other thought it worth printing, and as long as it was worth printing its writer could not be intruding.

Household Questions Cheerfully Answered.

Mr. Adam Foltz, operator Royal Theater, Findlay, Ohio, sends a nice little wooden box, about five inches long by an inch square, inside of which is a big, black, fat cigar, and the following letter:

> This is my first to the department. Smoke on me. It's a girl; nine pounds. What should I do to keep it ("it" is good. Ed.) from crying? Have been operating steadily for six years and have only worked in three houses in that time. Have run a Simplex, Edison and Power's Six A, but when it comes to running a brand new human machine of six lung power, why that is something else again. I am now using a Power's Six A, projecting a 15-foot picture, on an 85-foot throw, with 40 amperes of 60 cycle 110-volt current. We all know that girls are superior to boys—no, no I am getting mixed, I mean d. c. is superior to a. c. for projection, but I have seen lots of new fathers who got all swelled—er, I should say, lots of operators who did not know how to handle it (d. c.), and I would not be afraid to put up my kid—aw, darn the luck, my a. c. light against the d. c. operators I have seen around this part of the country. I have handled a. c. for five years and ought to understand it; I also used d. c. for one year.

If the very young lady proves to be as excellent as the cigar, you will have reason to congratulate yourself. I can plainly see that the advent of the aforesaid Miss is not occupying your attention very much. As to the crying, I would recommend one dose of milk mixed with two ounces of motherlove, to which, considerably later on, might possibly, upon occasion, be added a little judicious spanking. You are perfectly correct in assuming that the competent, careful operator can get as good, or better results, with a. c. as can the careless, or incompetent man, with d. c.

Interesting.

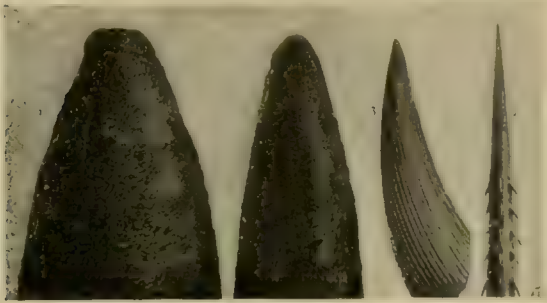
I recently ran across a [illegible] plate, in an English magazine, from which an interesting comparison may be drawn and applied to moving pictures.

In the picture the magnification is given as five hundred. No. 1 is the point of an ordinary pin, No. 2 that of a fine needle, No. 3 that of the thorn of a rose, and No. 4 the sting of a wasp. Now, it is evident that linear magnification is not meant, since if you take 500 pins and lay them side by side they would fill a space a great many times wider than the picture shown in number one, therefore, it is the magnification of area that is shown. Examining figure 2, the same being the point of a fine steel needle, you will observe that the magnification brings out enormous defects. Sharp as it seems to us, it is blunt and quite rough, while in figure 1 the point of a pin looks more like the end of a crow-bar than a finished, polished article. In this connection it is interesting to compare the work of nature in figures 3 and 4, with the handiwork of man as shown in figures 1 and 2.

But the thing which has induced me to republish this picture is the lesson it teaches in the marvels of photography, when we consider the huge magnification in moving pictures. Let us take, for example, a picture 12x16 feet. A picture 16 feet wide is 16x12=192 inches wide, but, as the machine aperture is only 15/16 of an inch in width, this would bring the total linear magnification up to about 195. In other words, it would take approximately 195 of the little film photographs to cover a space 16 feet wide. The height of the picture is 12 feet, or 12x12=144 inches, but the picture is only ¾ of an inch high, which means that it would require (144÷3) x 4 = 192 of the little film pictures to fill the 144 inches of height, hence, the film photograph has a screen area magnification of 192 x 195 = 37.440.



Magnified Five Hundred Times.

1.—A pin. 2—A fine needle. 3—Thorn of a rose. 4—Sting of a wasp.

Do you see the point, gentlemen? Here we have a cambric needle which looks like the point of a stove poker when magnified only five hundred times, yet we have a moving picture magnification of almost 40,000 times on a 16-foot picture, yet a sharp, clear-cut, splendid production is shown on the screen. Is it not wonderful, when you stop to think of it? Then, too, consider what the magnification is when you take a 20 or 23-foot picture. That would be almost, at a guess, double. It is really marvelous that the picture shows up as well as it does I am smiling now as I watch about 30,000 operators grab their stub of a lead pencil and begin figuring to see if I am not wrong. The magnification of 37.440 on a 16-foot picture does seem absurd. I looked at those figures two or three times myself to be sure that I was right, but when you stop to think that if the picture was one inch square (and it lacks considerable of that) it would take 144 of them to cover a square foot, and in a 12 x 16 picture there are 192 square feet of surface which gives almost 28,000 square inches of screen surface.

Not only will we find this interesting, but it teaches a lesson as well, since every fault in a film is magnified in exactly the same proportion that the photograph itself is, therefore, the defect which might not be noticed at all in a comparatively small picture, would stand out in glaring relief in the larger one. There is a moral lying around here loose, which I will leave you to dig out for yourselves.

Wants Help.

Arkansas writes as follows:

> I am a member of the I. A. T. S. E. and have been operating for the past three years, during which time I have not had to ask for help. Now, however, I am sitting on one of the branches of that tree you yourself occasionally climb. I have two Power's Six machines. One runs quietly and the film does not make any noise at all, while the other clicks and makes a noise in the lower loop. My intermittent is tight and has no lost motion; furthermore, the whole machine is in good condition. Could you tell me what the trouble is and how to stop it, as I like a smooth running machine?

Your trouble, in all probability, lies in the rollers on the bottom of apron (669, plate 1, page 272 of the handbook). Examine these rollers and if the hub of the roller sets ahead of the track of the apron, bend the roller back by bending the ears of the apron which holds its shaft. If this does not stop the trouble, or if the rollers seem to be already far enough back, then place a screw-driver against the left hand roller and strike it a light, sharp blow with a small hammer, so as to spread the rollers a little bit further apart. This I think will stop your trouble. To recapitulate, the noise is either due to the rollers being too far ahead (toward the lamp-house) or else the rollers are too close together—probably the latter. If this is the seat of the difficulty the clicking is probably worse when the carriage is up than when it is down.

From New Zealand.

Mr. L. W. Fowler, operator Princess Theater, Hastings, New Zealand, writes as follows:

> As a new subscriber to your excellent paper I am moved to send a few lines from this far-off spot. I recently noticed in your columns a few remarks by W. H. Bell, late of the International Pictures, of which film supply I was the first New Zealand customer, continuing with them until they amalgamated with the General Film Company, or, as it is known in New Zealand, The Fuller-Hayward Combine. The independent showmen were looking for a bad knock when this combine formed, but, so far there is very little to complain of, although the film is older and a little rainier than you see in the U. S.; still, there is an excellent variety of subjects, and a "star" (about 2,500 feet) in each change. Hastings, with a population of 7,000, and a suburban population of 5,000, has two picture theaters, running from 8 p. m. till 10.30. Prices, one shilling and sixpence; change bi-weekly; 7,000 feet each. My opposition uses a 20 B. H. P. (Brake Horse Power—Ed.) gas engine, and I use a 50-ampere, 92-volt, motor generator, which I raise or lower a few amperes, as required, with a rheostat. Price of current (town supply) just 500 units 3d.; all over that 1½d. Of American stuff I get mostly Lubin and Kalem, with other licensed makers, but very little independent. Operators like Lubin because it is easy to focus and requires little light. My throw is 72 feet; picture 23 feet. They won't stand for small pictures in this country. I can't use low voltage, say 70, and get good light. My experience is that with a 90-volt supply and 50 amperes, or say 55 amperes for a 25-foot picture, you get a white light free from discoloration and fog. The secret of the whole thing is burning the crater in the right place before the show starts. Can you give me any information about the auto or rotary converter—a double commutator machine? There are none in New Zealand. Makers claim it to be of higher efficiency than M. G. What I want to hear about is a machine taking 480 volts off mains and giving me 60 amperes at 90 volts, controlled by rheostat.

There are some sentences in Brother Fowler's letter which I am obliged to eliminate, since he was reasonably careless with his writing. As to the rotary converter, I can only repeat what I have already said, viz.: That this department cannot endorse or recommend any device until it has been convinced that the construction is mechanically right, and its electrical operation reasonably high in efficiency. If manufacturers want their devices recommended by this department, it is up to them to supply this proof, and the mere sending in of testimonials will not answer. Taking the Wagner Rotary Converter for example: In order to be convinced of its electrical efficiency we must have readings of the primary and the secondary wattage, taken during a considerable period under actual operating conditions, and these readings must be taken simultaneously, so that we can see what the in-put and out-put really is, and thus figure the actual working efficiency of the device. Talk is cheap, and manufacturers' claims are easy to make, but this is something that shows actual indisputable results. I have been told that the Rotary Converter is delivering satisfactory results, but whether it delivers better results than the motor-generator set is another question, and one which I could not possibly pass upon until such time as these tests have been submitted by both M. G and Rotary Converter manufacturers.

As to your not being able to get a good light from 70 volts, why there is nothing in that, because, regardless of what your line voltage may be, you can only use from 45 to 55 at the arc, therefore, what is the difference whether you have 110 or 500 volts on the line, so far as the operation of the arc is concerned? The surplus voltage has got to be broken down in some way, either by transformers, rheostats, or by some other means. There is not a large waste in 90 volts, but you can operate just as well from 70 as from 90, though the arc is a trifle more difficult to handle. As to the large picture, you certainly cannot get a brilliant production with a 23-foot picture, if you are using an ordinary screen of the non-reflective type. Of course, if your people demand a large picture, why I suppose it is up to you to give it to them, but I am of the opinion that 23 feet is excessive in any event, and that a smaller picture better illumined would, in the end, win out. Still you know your own people best. There are many objections to a large picture, not the least of which is the tremendous magnification of all defects in a film. Don't understand what you mean by "just 500 units." Probably you mean up to that amount the price is 3d. per unit (3 pence per k. w.). As I understand your money values, this would be about 6 cents per k. w., and only 3 cents above 500, which surely is cheap enough for anyone. I see your admission is one and sixpence, or, in U. S. money, about 37 cents. American managers of five and ten cent theaters please take notice.

From Muskogee, Oklahoma.

Muskogee, Oklahoma, orders a handbook and says he is the only one from that city to do so. He then asks:

> What is the difference between a 6½ condensing lens and a 4½?
> A certain operator in this city says there is none. Is he right?
> Projection is excellent and the local is strong.

Quite possibly after the Muskogee operators see your book there will be more of them who will wake up and get into the procession. Yes, there is a big difference between the 6½ condenser and the 4½, which you will find explained under the subject "lenses," pages 346 to 355, inclusive, of the handbook. The diagram and description on page 350 will show you how the curve of the condensing lens is determined, and what its focal length really means. A "condenser" consists of two lenses, and the focal length of the combination is much shorter than that of either one of the single lenses.

A Change.

Mr. Louis Marcus, formerly manager of the General Film Company's Salt Lake City Exchange, has accepted a position as president and general manager with the Notable Feature Film Company, Inc., Salt Lake City. Mr. Marcus is a most pleasant gentleman personally, and in addition to that is a thoroughly competent executive. We wish him every success in his new position.

Shameful Work.

Recently post cards advertising feature subjects at a theater on 86th Street, one half block from Bay Parkway, Brooklyn, began coming to the residence of the editor. Believing that a manager who had sufficient enterprise to thus advertise his house would surely put on at least a passably good show, and finding one of the cards to contain an advertisement of the four-reel Oliver Twist feature, the editor went over one evening on his motorcycle, paid his little ten cents, and sat through a show that was about as rank as anything he has seen up to date. In the first place, instead of placing the operating room central with the screen with a throw of something like 75 feet, as could easily have been done, it is located within probably 40 feet of the screen, and has a side throw of, I should guess, at least 10 or 15 feet. The distortion was, of course, terrific, though it was partly hidden by the black border on the screen. The show consisted, if I remember rightly, of seven reels, four of which were Oliver Twist, and one the Pathe Weekly, all for the sum of ten cents. However, the reason for this enormous quantity became apparent when one saw the projection. I do not think there was a single moment during the time the entire seven reels were running when there was not a shadow on the screen, and two or three times fully half the picture was momentarily entirely obscured. Such work is a disgrace and an injury to the moving picture business, and is indirectly an injury to every other exhibitor, at least in that neighborhood.

Had the operating room been properly located, and the projection what it should have been, the four-reel Oliver Twist feature would have been ample to have jammed that house during the entire evening. This manager substituted quantity for quality. I do not know who his operator is, and, frankly, I do not care to know, because he is a rank imitation, and has no more business with a license card than a hog would have in the new Jerusalem.

It is probably no earthly use to give this manager advice, but, nevertheless, I would suggest to him that he put his operating room at the rear end of the building, where it belongs, and hire an operator who can, and will produce something besides shadows. The machine itself seemed to be in good condition, and the picture was fairly steady. It is too bad that men who seek to manage moving picture theaters will not first learn what a moving picture is before they try to fill their pockets at the expense of injury to the industry as a whole.

An Old Timer.

Mr. Charles H. Hunt, Paducah, Kentucky, orders a handbook, and writes as follows:

> I have one of the old handbooks and would not do without it for anything. I have been turning a crank for sixteen years, but still I oftimes go to the handbook for information. I began with the Edison Universal, in the days when the take-up was a bushel basket. Today, I have a Simplex and Power's Six, a dissolver and a mercury arc rectifier. Nowadays you know where the picture is, but in the early stages it was something of a guess whether it would be on the ceiling, the walls, or the "sheet," as the screen was called then. Thank heaven, however, that period of the life of the moving picture has passed, and today it is a pleasure to operate. Now, in closing, last, but not least, we have a local union here in Paducah, only organized last March; it is Local 281, I. A. T. S. E.

I give space to this letter because remarks concerning the early days of projection are always interesting to the oldtimers. I see that Brother Hunt, although he has had many years' experience, still is able to find use even for the first edition of the handbook. If this is true, then how much more useful will the second edition be to him, or how much more useful would either one of the books be to one who had only been working at the profession a comparatively short time? Practical experience is a good school all right, but it is a mighty slow one. A combination of practical experience and book learning is the winner, not sometimes, but practically all the time.

Isolated Plant.

Sheboygan Falls, Wisconsin, has an isolated plant, the operation of which he describes as follows:

> With regard to your comments on electric light plants, August 9th issue, I have a six h. p. electric engine, connected to a 3½ k. w. d. c. dynamo, using from 50 to 60 amperes, 40 to 50 amperes of which are used in the projection arc, and the remainder in house lighting. Have had no trouble with this outfit, and have had a steadier, brighter light than I have seen from the city service in either Chicago or Milwaukee. Operators from various cities have viewed this plant in operation and they praised it highly. I wish to publicly thank Fairbanks, Morse & Company for the satisfaction it has given. I know of a 25-h. p. plant of this make which has run nine years, and has never failed to give light. Am running two shows every night, in a town of 1,600, with a seating capacity of 273, projecting a 12-foot picture at 77 feet. The total cost of lighting, per night, is two gallons of kerosene at 14 cents, and lubricating oil, 4 cents, making a total of 18 cents per night for light, and all the light we want, too. I send this in the hope that it may be of some help to those who are having trouble with their light, or are burdened with excessive light bills.

Something is twisted with your figures, Sheboygan. You say "two gallons of kerosene at 14 cents, and lubricating oil, 4 cents," and then give the total as 18 cents. You certainly do not get kerosene at 7 cents per gallon, therefore, I presume you mean two gallons at 14 cents, equals 28 cents, plus 4 cents, equals 32 cents as the total cost. We have had some very good reports from the Fairbanks-Morse outfit; also some poor ones. As I have said before, I think a great deal depends on the man and his handling of the machine. I am also of the opinion that none of the manufacturers put out a really adequate instruction book, calculated to enable a novice, to whom their outfits are often sold, to operate the same successfully, or in the best possible manner.

Ozone Generator.

Mr. D. R. Canady, Cleveland, Ohio, who recently, through the department, offered to supply instructions, by mail, for making ozone generators, proceeds to crawfish. He says:

> Since the publication of my letter in the Projection Department I have been literally swamped with mail. I have referred the writers to the Projection Department, saying I would describe everything therein, in detail, so here is the dope, in as few words as possible, and I trust it will be beneficial to many.
> The principle of the ozone generator is based on the use of a silent high tension electrical discharge, which creates the ozone gas.
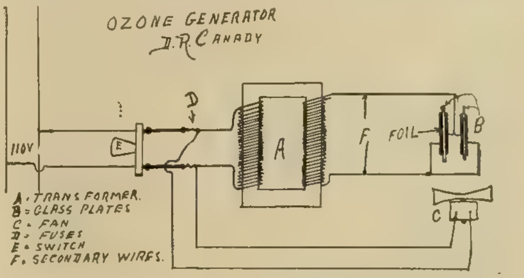
> In their simplest form ozone generators comprise one or more sheets of heavy glass, separating metal surfaces which are connected to a high tension transformer. The charge being unable to pass through or around the glass, forms a violet glow, or silent discharge. An electric fan maintains a current of air between the metal plates and glass, which passes through the surrounding atmosphere. Alternating current being used it is stepped from 110 volts up to 15,000 and 20,000 volts. A ⅛ to ¼ k. w. transformer is the proper size for this purpose, as it can be connected to an ordinary lamp socket with perfect safety. In getting a transformer, state the exact number of volts and cycles it is to be used on. A number of heavy glass plates should be coated on each side with heavy copper foil. There should be a margin left all around to keep the spark from jumping around the edges. No definite dimensions can be given, owing to the variation in transformers, thickness of glass, etc. The builder can obtain best results by a little experimenting, such as varying the number of glass plates, etc. This outfit should be set in a cabinet and placed at best advantage. The Price Mfg. Company, 737 Prospect Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, specializes in this line and can be recommended for any parts needed.



Friend Canady did not realize the fact that the Moving Picture World is read every week by nearly every operator and manager in this country, as well as a very large number of others connected with the business; also by managers and operators in Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Hawaii, England, and even in far-off China. So it is, therefore, not surprising that he was swamped with mail and decided to avail himself of the department, rather than United States mail. On behalf of our readers we thank him for his excellent instructions, which will, no doubt, be of large value.

A New House.

Mr. Leslie K. Moore, Paulding, Ohio, orders a handbook and says:

> I recently opened a new theater, "The Amusu," in a fireproof building, erected in accordance with the Ohio State Building Laws. I have a Simplex machine. Have a little light trouble, the same consisting of a ghost on the screen. Have one 6½ and one 7½ condensing lens, the latter in front, with a four-inch e. f. lens. Am using an alabastine screen and take 60-cycle current through a Fort Wayne compensarc. Why do some makes of film have more movement on the screen than others?

If by the "ghost" you mean a blue spot in the center of the screen, you can probably eliminate this by moving lamp-house backwards or forwards, though it is probably due to the wrong setting of your carbons—see carbon setting for a. c., page 209, of the handbook. Your condenser combination ought to be all right. The reason some makes of films have more movement than others lies in the fact that their perforations are mechanically less perfect.

Disapproves.

Local Union No........sends in the following:

> At our last regular meeting your article on page 1280, September 20th issue, was discussed, and the following resolution adopted: "Resolved, that Local Union........heartily disapproves of the law in question, and considers it a disgrace to the organization. Further, resolved, that this Union is heartily in favor of the Projection Department, and the books issued by Brother Richardson, and of anything else that tends to educate the operator."

This communication comes under the seal of the union, but the name and location of the organization are, for obvious reasons, omitted. In this connection I might say that several hundred letters have been received from individuals, in which the law named has been denounced, and by some it has been denounced very bitterly, whereas others have simply confined themselves to disapproval of the action. The letter is a sample of several already received from Unions.

Ammeter for Operating Room Recommended.

Mr. T. J. King, of the Engineering Department of the Fort Wayne Electric Works, Fort Wayne, Indiana, writes as follows:

> I have noticed, recently, in the Projection Department your recommendation of the use of an ammeter in the projection arc circuit. Personally, I have advocated this for a long time and in connection with our line of a. c. to d. c. compensarcs we are putting out a small panel which carries an ammeter and voltmeter in addition to the field control rheostat. You will find this panel illustrated in the booklet which I enclose. Where these instruments have been conscientiously used by operators, the resulting decrease in power bills, for the same class of projection, has been very noticeable. We find that with 28 to 30 amperes d. c., the careful operator is able to get better results than the careless operator obtains when using 45 to 60 amperes. As a matter of fact, I believe that, for ordinary black and white pictures, there should be little demand for more than 30 or 35 amperes at the arc, basing this opinion on results now being obtained in actual practice. I am very much interested in the department, and find that most of the operators depend on it for the bulk of their information. I shall be glad to be of any assistance to you in connection with the department at any time.

In the first place, I desire to thank Mr. King for his very kind offer of assistance and he may rest assured that I shall not hesitate to avail myself of the same. I am glad indeed to have my view as regards the use of ammeters backed up by an authority of this kind. I cannot, however altogether agree with Mr. King as regards the matter of amperage. I agree thoroughly with him that the careful operator can obtain as good, or better, results with 30 or 35 amperes, than the careless operator can or will with more current, because the careless operator will not obtain good results, no matter what he may use. He is even worse than an incompetent man. I think, however, that Mr. King will agree with me, when he stops to consider the subject, that the matter of amperage depends on several factors, notably the kind of screen and the area of the picture. Thirty-five amperes might give excellent illumination of a 16-foot picture, using a mirror screen, but it would not give the same brilliancy on a 16-foot picture and a plaster screen. Thirty-five amperes might give a very fine illumination on a 16-foot picture, but not give a good illumination on a 22-foot picture, using the same kind of screen. To my mind the greatest benefit derived from an ammeter comes when it is located close to the observation port, where it is constantly under the eye of the operator, who is thus able to note any variations in the current consumption instantly. By observation of the ammeter he soon learns several things, one of which is that by shortening his arc just a little too much his amperage will jump up fully 25%, and his illumination will at the same time decrease by almost 25%. With an ammeter constantly under the operator's observation he soon learns exactly at what arc length the best illumination is had with the less current consumption, and unquestionably, the competent, careful man will soon save the price of the instrument in current bills, and at the same time get more uniform results on the screen. Mr. King's view that 35 amperes is ample is correct where a modern screen is used, and the picture is not excessive in size, but he must remember that the tendency is towards brilliant illumination, and the audiences as a rule like brilliant pictures rather than a more artistic, dull one; also the modern tendency is to increased light in the auditorium, which also calls for greater screen brilliancy; hence, there are many things to consider in determining the necessary amperage. With an ordinary plaster screen and an 18-foot picture, in my judgment 45 amperes is none too much, but I have said several times, and I again say that 45 amperes is, in my judgment, about the economical limit of amperage, owing to the fact that beyond this figure the crater becomes so large that the lens system is unable to utilize but a small percentage of the increased light.

I shall be very glad indeed to have Mr. King contribute to the department at any time, regardless of whether we agree with him on any particular subject or not. The Fort Wayne Engineering Department undoubtedly is in [illegible] valuable information, and they are hereby cordially invited to do so.

A Puzzle.

Greenville, Texas, writes:

> In September 13th issue, Texas describes exactly the same trouble I have, under the heading "Freed for Keeps." He is using a Motiograph, whereas I have a Power's Six, projecting a 12-foot picture on a mirroroid screen, using 30 amperes d. c. through a General Electric rectifier. When using an ordinary Power's three-wing shutter the flicker and flashing is very bad indeed, when running at any speed, fast or slow. I lowered my amperage to 20, with no difference in result. Am sure the trouble is in the rectifier, because I took my machine head up to another theater, where they also use a Power's Six, mirroroid screen, G. E. rectifier and the same size picture, and the projection was flickerless. Now, I can use a shutter of my own make on it, all three blades the same size, just wide enough to prevent travel ghost, and get no flicker, but it cuts the light too much. If the trouble lies in the rectifier, would the results be the same when using either shutter? It is only recently that this trouble has showed up. The rectifier we are using has been in service two years. I put in a new mercury tube, but without changing results. Why is it that none of Lyman Howe's operators ever contribute to the department? I watched some of Howe's projection recently, and to say it was perfect would be putting it mildly. I am sure they could give us some worth while ideas.

Mr. Lyman Howe's projection is a part of his stock in trade, and Mr. Howe has great difficulty in securing operators who can, and will, deliver projection up to his standard. He recently came very near having to close down one of his shows because he could not find an operator of the class he demands, and yet we are told the profession of operating is overcrowded. Yes, as I have said before, it is overcrowded—with incompetents. But, as Mr. Howe's experience proves, there is an enormous lack of really high-class men. We should be glad indeed to hear from Brother Howe's operators, if they are allowed to write for publication. But that is a question of some doubt, since, as I said, Howe's projection is a part of his stock in trade. As to the other matter, I do not see how it could be in the rectifier, always assuming the current supplied the two houses to be of the same cycle. If you, however, are using very low cycle current, that might account for the trouble, but, on the other hand, as the other shutter stops the difficulty, then the trouble must lie in the shutter itself, and there is a difference somewhere, and somehow in the screens of the two theaters. The proposition you put up seems almost impossible. However, I do not think the trouble can be in the rectifier. The only thing I see for you to do is to use a shutter which stops the flicker and increase your amperage. If any of our correspondents can offer any assistance in this matter, or any suggestions, let them stand forth and be heard. By the way, set your shutter as close to the lens as you can get it. You mention travel ghost, therefore, must know what it is; otherwise I would think your trouble was flashes of travel ghost at intermittent intervals, due to worn gears or parts.

Screen Trouble.

New York City has trouble as follows:

> I have a silver screen, three years old, which has not a blemish on it so far as tarnish is concerned. It shows a brightness second to none, except a mirror screen, but the picture is never in real sharp focus. It is more or less hazy at all times. I have tried different lenses, and lined the optical centers, but the trouble remains. I also have a buckling of the films more or less at times. I have put in new track and new tension shoes. Have tried every method I could think of, but the trouble still is there. The manager claims it is just lately, since I came, that the trouble has showed up, but all I did was to clean the lenses. Do you suppose removing the dirt ruined them? As to that new I. A. law, I, for one, do not approve of any such thing. By what right do a few men make such a ridiculous law as this, and ask the thousands of operators to live up to it? Like yourself, I am a railroad man. Am a member of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen and the I. A. T. S. E. If the B. R. T. convention should try such a stunt, the members would have more trouble in their ranks than Carter has pills. If [illegible], I am going to try to help him, and would do so if they had twelve such laws as that. You are entirely at liberty to use my name. I should worry. I have one of the few New York houses which pay $35.00, with supper hour. My boss wants results and he does not care who the man is, or what he belongs to, or doesn't belong to, as long as he delivers them.

As to your light trouble, why, I do not quite understand. If you did not change anything, and did nothing but clean the lenses, then the manager is not telling exactly the truth. There are two things possible, however, viz.: In cleaning the lenses you may have used a cloth which left a little fog, or you may not have gotten the lens together exactly right but, on the other hand, if you have tried different lenses that does not hold good. So the only explanation I see is that the screen has been recently cleaned and polished, which causes it to reflect too brightly, the result being a sort of hazy, or out-of-focus effect. I would suggest that you get a few yards of unbleached muslin and hang over a portion of the screen. If the picture is perfectly sharp on the muslin, the trouble lies in the screen. As to the film buckling it is possibly due to excessive dryness in the film itself. Very dry film often buckles—sometimes quite badly.

A Side Motion.

Mr. George Harnsberger, proprietor Dixie Theater, Lander, Wyoming, orders a handbook and writes:

> I am using Power's "Six" Machine and am troubled with a side movement of my picture. Have lately installed a new intermittent cross and shaft, and cam shaft, and to all sense of feel there is no lost motion in the intermittent parts. Both sides of the intermittent sprocket seem to have worn, at the same distance, yet the side jump remains.

You have not said where you obtained those parts, Brother Harnsberger, and that cuts quite some figure in the matter, as parts made by others than the machine manufacturer are likely not to be true. It is possible that the intermittent sprocket is not true. However, first see that there is no end motion in the intermittent sprocket shaft. (See instruction 48, page 285 of the handbook for means of eliminating end motion). Next examine the top gate rollers (691, plate 2, page 274 of the handbook) and see that they fit the film snugly, stretching the spring a little if necessary. You have not described the side motion, and that is where you err. If it is regular, occurring four times each turn of the machine crank, then the trouble is certainly in your intermittent sprocket. It is either not true, or else has end play, or if the side motion is irregular and intermittent, then it is probably due to something else. Correspondents should be very careful to give full details when they write. If you give too many details I can eliminate the unnecessary ones, but if you do not give enough, then I have to have a guessing contest with myself.

"ANN OF THE TRAILS" (Vitagraph), October 6.—A Western story of rough people with the first act in a gaming saloon and the second in a cabin up on the hills. The woman has married the trapper, but he doesn't know her past and later, just before a child comes to them, he is told. This gives a few moments of drama which these players put over well. Daisy E. Smith is the author and W. J. Bauman produced it.

"THE MISSIONARY AND THE ACTRESS" (Selig), October 7.—An actress lightly flirts with a serious-minded minister, who then goes to work among the island people, while she forgets him in the gay life of a Broadway star. In the end, after he has found her in a restaurant and made a scene, she is converted and at length goes to help him care for lepers. There is a good deal of prettiness about the picture and its story, serious without being heavy, is of the kind that often proves very popular. The leading woman, Ethel Davis, is charming in a picture, and Joe King, the minister, is dignified in his role. An excellent offering. Mrs. Owen Bronson is the author and Lem B. Parker produced it.

"PLANTS WHICH EAT" (Patheplay), October 7.—Surely this picture will hold the interest of the average audience. These plants one may have heard of, but it is ten to one that he thinks them flora of tropical countries. On the other hand, the three specimens shown to us are found in temperate climes, and it is clearly shown how they capture flies and small insects and digest them.

"HOW MOUNTAINS GROW" (Patheplay), October 7.—On the same reel with the foregoing is this which shows the Pathe Company getting into a stride that will be very profitable. It is an offering which illustrates in the clearest and simplest way the stupendous working of the forces of Nature, and seems to have been prepared with care by some very competent instructor. It is most commendable; is along the lines of great work.

"A JOURNEY THROUGH CRIMEA" (Patheplay), October 7.—A bit of travel film that takes us to an out-of-the-way corner of the world. It is clearly photographed. The three subjects on this split reel make a very desirable offering.

"A WILLFUL COLLEEN'S WAY" (Edison), October 7.—The story told by this film is good, although not at all new. But it has been put on in small scenes very theatrically, and the artificialness of all but a few of these scenes and also of the acting gives it a barren effect. That scene in which we find the priest taking his breakfast is most attractive and the scene in the church when the thunder storm is raging is also very effective; they are the offering's chief merit. George Lessey is the producer.

"A MATTER OF DRESS" (Essanay), October 7.—This situation is too unlikely to be deeply interesting and it has been developed in an unconvincing way. The heroine wants a lover who will be fervent even when she is in curl papers and a wrapper. "The catch of the season" socially falls in love with her in evening gown, but he can't stand the papers, and in the end she goes back to her first love—the stable boy.

"THE TWO COWARDS" (Lubin), October 7.—George Terwilliger has done much better work than this commercial offering which L. B. Carlton has produced almost wholly without finesse so that at times the artificialness of it is nearly painful. The trouble with such situations is that they compel the heroine to show herself in the very unattractive guise of a Pharisee. Beautiful photography is the chief merrit of this offering.

"A HOMESPUN TRAGEDY" (Vitagraph), October 7.—A rich widower's wayward son needs a mother's care and the woman accepts the proposal and soon the new husband is jealous of the son, but without cause. The outcome is tragic, for the son commits murder and is shot wantonly by the sheriff, a thing not commendable in any sheriff. It is the very best offering today, for the plot is effectively handled and the characters splendidly acted. The story is not great and suffers much from badly chosen subtitles. Edith Story, as the woman, does strong work, outclassing all the other players, though Ned Finley with the other support does well, too. The script is by Eric Hoecker and the producers are Ned Finley and James W. Castle.

"SAVED FROM THE VIGILANTES" (Selig), Oct. 9.—A good story pictured by William Duncan and his regular company. The plot, it does not need to be said, is strictly old; all pictures with a name like this are likely to have old plots, but its incidents, with one exception, have been very well and logically chosen and there is freshness in the backgrounds that give good atmosphere to the story. The incident of the dying tramp was more useful to the story than convincing. A good offering.

"NEVER KNOWN TO SMILE" (Biograph), Oct. 9.—O'Brien (William Murray) is being put on his nerves by a wife who never smiles and from this circumstance rise a few comical happenings which are not so funny as the characters who set them forth. The offering seemed to please nearly all and it made some in the audience laugh.

"SCENTING A TERRIBLE CRIME" (Biograph), Oct. 9.—On the same reel with the foregoing is this, also a farce of comical characters and it has a tub of sauerkraut in it, the odor from which sets a bunch of farcical cops, undertakers and a coroner doing stunts There are one or two good jokes and the audience seemed to enjoy it.

"LOVE AND THE LAW" (Essanay), Oct. 9.—A picture by the company making Essanay westerns that has a pleasing freshness. The sheriff loves the girl and so does the deputy. This makes it easy for the villain, who also wants her, to make trouble and the outcome is cleverly conceived and plainly delighted the audience. The whole picture has been handled by both producer and players in a natural, human way that is commendable. It makes a good offering.

"DAD'S INSANITY" (Essanay), Oct. 8.—A picture with a very farcical situation in which Dad and his son both get left, the first, because he was deceived, and the second, because Dad, after telling his troubles to the hilarious cops, comes back to the house with a police uniform on and brings a reporter to write up the story. The son and the rich girl are about to get married; but the reporter turns out to be the girl's youthful sweetheart and she marries him.

"CAST AMID BOOMERANG THROWERS" (Melies), Oct. 9.—There were some in the audience who failed to get in sympathy with the simplicity of this picture's story. A sailor with a chart is cast amid boomerang throwers. They would have killed him, but every time he waves the chart they, thinking it an evil thing, flee. This happens several times and whenever it came, several laughed. It was, in fact, too simple to get over; but we found much that was interesting in the picture, which was made with the help of Australian aborigines (the screen erroneously refers to them as aboriginals) and was photographed, of course, in the scenes it is said to picture.

"A CEYLON TEA ESTATE" (Selig), Oct. 10.—A short picture of gathering and weighing tea. It was not clear why the picture was tinted for moonlight; although possibly had the photography been clear it would have been unnecessary.

"ONLY FIVE YEARS OLD" (Selig), Oct. 10.—On the same reel is this drama of a little girl who wanders away from an orphanage into the home of three maiden women and into their hearts. The story may appeal to older persons and possibly young ones.

"THE MILLIONAIRE'S WARD" (Patheplay), Oct. 10.—A rich young man protects a young woman from the wrath of an organ grinder—she had been the latter's assistant; the young man takes her from a police station and sends her abroad that her voice may be cultivated. When she returns two years later a jealous young woman nearly causes the singer's arrest by placing jewelry in the room of the returning student and accusing her. She was detected by the housekeeper, who later informs the police. It did seem as if the housekeeper might have prevented the calling of the detectives by telling what she knew. The picture is interesting and well played. Jack Standing has the role of the millionaire.

"CUTEY'S WATERLOO" (Vitagraph), Oct. 10.—This comedy seems hardly up to the Vitagraph standard in the way of fun making. Wallie Van contributes his best efforts, but he does not apparently make much headway. Lillian Walker has the role of a country girl, who in order to get revenge on her faithless young man, dresses in her brother's clothes.

"WHEN FRIENDSHIP CEASES" (Vitagraph), Oct. 8.—A picture of a couple of farcical tramps on a farm with at times an amusing touch of burlesque. There were several people in the audience who were quite amused by it and laughed more than once. The tramps arrive as pals; but love for the farmer's daughter who had been growing more beautiful every year for a long while, comes between them and they fight a duel, the most amusing thing in the picture.

"BOY WANTED" (Edison), Oct. 8.—This little true comedy by Lucy Oppenheim takes us into the life of a small boy who wants a brother. There were preparations going on and when he asks the reason of them he is told that the stork is going to bring a new baby to the house. He wants the stork to bring a boy. Being by nature an inquisitive youngster, Bobby learns that a sign, "Boy Wanted," hung out at a nearby toy shop has resulted in Yale Boss' coming, a new boy, to the shop, so he buys the sign and tacks it up on the pillar in front of his home. When the new baby is brought by the stork, it is a boy and Billy claims that credit it due to him. The picture reflects credit on its authoress and on C. J. Williams, its producer. It has been written and put on in a human, delightful way. Kathleen Coughlin plays Bobby; William Wadsworth, his father; Clara Adams, his nurse, and there are several smaller roles.

"THE PINK GRANITE INDUSTRY AT MILFORD, MASS." (Edison), Oct. 8.—A clear picture of an up to date quarry and manufacturing plant. It shows the whole process of making perfect blocks for building and is instructive. It will interest some among the spectators greatly. On the same reel with "Boy Wanted."

"THT SMUGGLER" (Patheplay), Oct. 8.—An unrealistic set-to between smugglers and revenue officers opens this picture; followed by some lovely scenes with water and a rocky shore; then it switches to a fashionable boarding school where we find Betty, one of the girls, who is in love with the chiet revenue officer. Betty's father, as can easily be foreseen, is shown to be the chief smuggler. From this situation, a rather old melodrama is built, of the kind that still has a following. The picture has action and can be commended as a fair offering.

"THE DREAM OF DAN McGUIRE" (Selig), Oct. 8.—McGuire, the hod carrier, again falls asleep on loose bricks during the noon hour and dreams of a million. The farcical incidents of this dream amused the audience and made several laugh. The chief part of its fun comes from seeing the McGuires flying in high society with low society manners and this is made so as to be effective even to the gallery. Fred Huntly is both author and producer.

"A DEAL IN OIL" (Lubin), Oct. 14.—Harry Myers is the author of this good comedy-drama. Also he plays the lead. Opposite him is Ethel Clayton. The story will interest and amuse.

"THREE SCRAPS OF PAPER" (Essanay), October 14.—There was one feature of this picture that will arouse interest. That is the fight between the police and the thugs at the end. The story as a whole is a combination of improbabilities. In the first place, a man having relations with thugs is assumed to possess the belief that he can compel a millionaire's daughter to marry him at the point of a pistol and get away with it. Secondly, when the girl is kidnapped she throws from a blind a note calling for help. The paper is in three pieces. One piece falls into the window of her sweetheart, a distance away. The second drops into the garden of a florist, who is just engaged in sending a bunch of roses to the home of the girl, and as he sees on the scrap the name of the girl's father he incloses the note. The third is found by a peddler, who puts it into a coffee pot, later selling the utensil to the cook of the girl's household. Of course, the girl is rescued.

"A YANKEE IN MEXICO" (Patheplay), October 14.—The best feature of this picture is the atmosphere. We have the Mexican backgrounds and the costumes. It was careless of the duelists about to put over a "frame-up" to leave the case containing the pistols where the girl could remove the cartridge from the second weapon. The alternating of the tinting in the close-up and distance views militated against the illusion. The picture will interest.

"THE PETRIFIED FORESTS OF ARIZONA" (Patheplay), October 14.—On the same reel is this most entertaining series of views of 1,800 acres of petrified forest. Sub-titles most lucidly explain the unusual subject.

"THE BALLYHOO'S STORY" (Vitagraph), October 14.—A story told in pictures by an Indian chief selling his wares at a resort. The backgrounds are excellent—of mountain and plain. The tale is conventional, but is treated in an interesting manner.

"THE FAMILY'S HONOR" (Edison), October 14.—A story of the Spanish-American war. The opening scene is a built-up picture of the old Maine lying in Havana harbor. The setting, as well as the later explosion, is realistically handled. Altogether it is a very good picture, impressive at times, in spite of the manifest handicaps imposed on a director when he tries to make a Cuban picture in the North.

"THE HIGHER LAW" (Lubin), October 11.—A strong offering, depicting the careless disregard a pampered woman of the well-to-do class sometimes has for those in less fortunate circumstances. Instead of paying the $500 she owes to her dressmaker, the wealthy woman pays it on a diamond necklace. The manner in which the necklace was turned over to the seamstress was natural and pleasing. The picture would perhaps have been more effective if the seamstress' son had been shown and also if the trial scene had been eliminated for want of prosecution by the district attorney. Arthur Johnson appears in the latter part and has good support. A pleasing production.

"TALKATIVE TESS" (Patheplay), October 11.—A comedy of the quietly pleasing type, with a string of laughs at the end. John is blessed with a wife whose tongue is continually running. Her talk drives both himself and the dog from the house. When a burglar ties his wife to a chair and gags her, John sets up the drinks and is highly elated. The photography is clear. The idea is slight, but owing to the manner in which it is presented, holds the interest. The closing scenes were very amusing. Good comedy offering.

"THE GIRL AND THE OUTLAW" (Edison), October 11.—A film story of the open, written by Frank McGlynn. The one strongly romantic scene is where the outlaw takes care of the lost sheriff's daughter. The wood views were particularly fine, and except for a little slowness in development the picture leaves little to be desired. Mary Fuller and Augustus Phillips play the leads. The night scene at the camp fire was good and the closing scenes were artistically handled. A pleasing romance with a somewhat conventional plot.

"BRONCHO BILLY'S OATH" (Essanay), October 11.—In which G. M. Anderson appears in the familiar role of Broncho Billy. He robs a stage to get money to pay his pal's doctor bill. Later, because of a girl, the pal betrays him. When arrested Billy swears vengeance and later escapes from the sheriff. There is a chase through the woods and the sheriff through the window shoots the pal in mistake for the fugitive. Broncho Billy is then arrested for the hold-up.

"SO RUNS THE WAY" (Biograph), October 11.—A notable presentation of a problem in society life. The rich young man is practically roped into his marriage with a cold-blooded society favorite, by her designing mother. The proposal scene was excellently handled. Later, when he is financially ruined, he steals some jewels at a reception. This was the weakest scene in the production, as the open, unguarded jewel cases would hardly have been left as they were. The picture ends happily, the young wife awakening after the husband is arrested. She pleads for his release and succeeds in obtaining it. From the standpoint of acting, characterization and photography this is eminently successful and well worth seeing because of its strong story.

"HEARTBROKEN SHEP" (Vitagraph), October 9.—Helen Costello and Shep, portrayed by himself, have the leads in this pretty story. Shep's ability to be a "dead dog" when instructed adds much to the realism of the play. His calling of the firemen and their apparatus may be against ordinary human reason, but it made a mighty good scene. It seemed strange that the fireman should desert a dog in a slowly burning house.

Licensed Specials.

"THE FLOWER OF DESTINY" (Cines), October 7.—A picture in two parts with its chief object not so much to tell a story as to create an atmosphere of the Renaissance. It is a very pretty offering that seems to have been taken on one of the small islands or in some village on the shore of a beautiful Italian lake. Among its backgrounds are grand palace rooms, gardens, bits of romantic-looking stone steps, old-time streets, battlement windows, etc. The players are graceful in what they do and the heroine adds her beauty to most of the scenes, which are often very lovely. The story: It is very romantic and has a foreign taste, cannot be termed strong, but is sufficient to keep interest awake. The photography, as usual, is of high order.

"THE RIDDLE OF THE TIN SOLDIER" (Kalem), Oct. 8.—The subtitle is given to this picture, "A Madelyn Mack Detective Story," and the part of girl sleuth is played by Alice Joyce. The story could hardly be called probable; but the picture has much that will go a long way toward making it popular. At its end, police raid a house where kidnappers are holding two children of a capitalist and there follows a melee and hand to hand struggle that wrecks the house and all the furniture in it. This series of scenes take up a good bit of the film and is exciting. There is a certain freshness in the offering, due perhaps, most to the careful staging, giving new scenes and a somewhat different atmosphere. The players do well, though it isn't a picture that calls for acting of a high order. Marguerite Courtot plays a peculiar young woman, daughter of a millionaire (Henry Hallam), who schemes to persuade her father to build a "home for slum children" and kidnaps her own little brother. She falls into the hands of a set of crooks and it takes Madelyn (Alice Joyce) to rescue her and her brother .

"BREED OF THE NORTH" (Lubin), Oct. 9.—A two-part special, giving a melodrama dealing with Canadian frontier people and in which the R. N. W. Mounted Police figure prominently. The story has an atmosphere very much like the North Woods series recently produced by the Eclair people. It is a double exposure picture with the leading man, Edgar Jones, playing twins who look just alike. One is an officer sent out to bring in the other innocent, though accused of murder. The plot has been handled in a first rate way and the picture makes a good substantial offering.

"THE TWO MOTHERS" (Patheplay), Oct. 9.—This picture appealed to this reviewer hardly at all, on account of its improbability, lack of real dramatic reason, in the first place, and in the second, its unpleasantness. We may add that the assistant to the exhibitor liked it. It has action; but if a person considers the quality of its action he will hardly find the heroine's action at the end to be either typical, probable, natural or even commendable on the grounds of ordinary justice—a grave fault in a melodrama. The picture's most noticeable other weakness is the manner, not typical surely, in which the woman was freed from the asylum. Such a patient should have been provided for; she should not have been left to wander back to the old home expecting to find her child.

"DEAR OLD GIRL" (Essanay), October 10.—An unusual story. It is also of unusual strength. Its dominant note is pathos. You feel it right at the beginning, amid the camaraderie of the college men, in the greeting of the young man and his sweetheart, in the sanction of the marriage by the girl's parents. In spite of the brightness of the outlook you feel it is too good to be true. Technically the story is a gem. Frank Bushman never had a better medium for showing what he can do; and he never had better support or better direction. Beverly Bayne, as the fiancee, is splendid; her work shows what she can do when playing opposite a real artist. William Bailey, as the chum of the bridegroom-to-be, is all his best friend would have him; deserving of mention also are the two who form the other half of the quartet. Miss Blanchard and Mr. Dayton—the latter of whom also filled the brief role of the engineer—as the parents contributed their share. The surprise is the colored servant, Robert Walker. He gave the finishing touch. "Dear Old Girl" is a rare picture. Don't miss it.

"IN THE SHADOW OF THE MOUNTAINS" (Edison), October 10.—There is a touch of melodrama in these two reels, but it does no harm—in fact, it seems to fit in. Ben Wilson and Robert Brower have the leads, ably assisted by Frank A. Lyon, who contributes a bit of comedy. Charles Sutton plays well the role of the friend who casts bread upon the waters. Gertrude McCoy in the part of the daughter of the old miner is charming. The picture is well produced by George Lessey and holds the interest all the way.

"THE TEST" (Vitagraph), October 11.—A very strong two-reel offering, written by John Kemble and directed by Captain Harry Lambart. Clara Kimball Young gives a compelling representation of the neglected wife, who remains true to her husband in spite of the insidious advances of Gordon, a fellow officer. The South African scenes were splendidly produced, particularly the military ball, the barracks and the plague camp. Harry Northrup plays the husband and Herbert L. Barry the false friend. A memorable production, well acted and finely photographed.

"THE LAST MINUTE" (Eclipse-Kleine), October 14.—In this picture Joe Hamman portrays the part of "Arizona Bill," a name apparently given to him not because he is a bad man, but one of determination. The location of the story is the great West, but as so often happens in pictures made on the other side of the water and intended to reproduce the atmosphere of the land beyond the Rockies the task was too much for the producer. There are many apparent inconsistencies which weaken the story. As entertainment the picture goes over. There are some thrilling situations and sensational episodes. One of these is where a man jumps into a stream from the top of a moving train and nearly lands on the bank. Plainly it was a narrow escape. The central theme of the picture—that the heiress-niece and the will must be in court at a certain minute or she would lose the property—was plainly weak and also illogical.

Independent

"FROM OUT THE STORM" (Broncho), October 20.—An escaped convict goes West and endeavors to take his former pal, now happily married, back to her old life. Indian warfare intervenes and the convict is shot and killed after many typical scenes. The letters thrown upon the screen at the beginning were hard to read, being too finely written. The release is one of average interest, not being particularly new as to plot.

"FANTOMAS, THE MAN IN BLACK" (Gaumont),—This is the second in the series of detective stories. It is interesting and at times exciting. One feature is the uncoupling of the car from the express and the close-up views of the interior. The collision of the car with the approaching express is very well done. It is studio work, but to many the idea will not occur. The struggle between the great snake and the detective is thrilling. A novel twist is given to the escape of the crook from the detective following the arrest just outside the restaurant. The use of the two false arms will stir any theater. The scenes in the haunted house are finely handled, especially the escape of the crook through his submersion in the tank and the use of the hollow bottle for a breathing tube. As a detective story the picture is of unusual strength.

"A DEEP SEA LIAR" (Thanhouser), October 12.—This film opens with a demonstration of life-saving apparatus on the California coast and then drifts into a sea episode, having but little connection with the foregoing. The stranger rescued at sea tells the girl quite a yarn about his yacht and the like, but she afterward learns he was only a deckhand. A very slight story in this.

"A HEALTHY NEIGHBORHOOD" (Keystone), October 16.—Another screamingly funny comedy of the nonsensical sort. Ford Sterling gives a most enjoyable characterization of Dr. Noodles, who places banana skins on the walk in order to get patients. This reel works up into a highly diverting situation. A good comedy number.

"TWO OLD TARS" (Keystone), October 20.—One of the Keystone laugh producers which would make a confirmed dyspeptic forget his troubles. The rescue of the drowning man with a derrick was most ludicrous, and the antics of the police force in the ocean also brought laughter. A good release.

"JIM'S ATONEMENT" (Frontier), October 25.—Good Western drama. The female leads are well played by Eugenia Forde, who seems scarcely older than her daughter, and Victoria Forde. The story is of a settler who in mistake kills the father of a girl, whom he then adopts. Later when the sweetheart of the girl has committed murder the foster-father assumes the guilt and permits the assassin to escape. When the woman to whom the former had also been making love denounces the actual criminal the man in jail is released and discovers that the child he had reared is really in love with him.

"MISS FAIRWEATHER OUT WEST" (Frontier), October 23.—Dot Farley makes fun in this comedy. There are amusing situations which are well handled. The incident of the stockings of the untidy uncle might well have been omitted. A director who tries to make laughter by such tactics pays a dear price for it.

"JANE OF MOTH-EATEN FARM" (Imp), October 30.—Walter MacNamara has written a most amusing script and George L. Tucker has produced it. It is pronounced burlesque. The fun is continuous from start to finish. The mirth springs from the settings, the story and the fine work of the players. Imagine the serious-faced William E. Shay in small-boy sailor garb being driven to meet his sweetheart Jane in a cab. The "cab" is a wheelbarrow. The cabbie is Howard Crampton, attired to the last thread in full coachman's regalia. William Welsh is the banker-villain, who tries to win Jane before she learns of the legacy of $15,000,000.63 which is coming to her; he even threatens to foreclose the mortgage on the family phonograph if the hand of the daughter is withheld from him. The Jane, of course, is Jane Gail, who in the opening scene goes out to milk the cow. She is attired in the latest mode; in the mirror suspended from the animal's haunches she arranges her hair before proceeding with her work. The picture is a laughmaker from beginning to end.

"A QUIET LITTLE WEDDING" (Keystone), October 23.—A typical Keystone offering, not quite as funny as some, but containing many humorous spots. It starts with the marriage of the Fat Boy to a homely maiden. The rejected rival begins to stir up things and brings on much excitement, winding up with the principals on a high cliff, the bride having fallen over and become entangled in a tree.

"THE FLIRT" (Reliance), October 15.—In this subject Charles Dickson proves beyond doubt that he has the true comedy sense and knows how to work out a situation delicately and at the same time effectively. The flirt, represented by Anna Laughlin, enjoys herself with both Howard and Harry in turn. Later they send a clerk to pose as a young millionaire. The flirt sets her cap for him and a real love affair unexpectedly develops, which turns the tables on the conspirators. Comedies like this are always appealing.

"POOR OLD MOTHER" (Reliance), October 13.—A story that will be displeasing to some observers who will undoubtedly think the mother went a little too far in her rejuvenation. In order to prove to her children that she is not so old as they imagine, Mrs. Engle buys a ball gown, dances the tango, smokes cigarettes, drinks champagne and "spoons" with a young man in the conservatory. The contrast was not good, as the mother did not look very old in the first place. This is not to be classed as an elevating type of film and its points of merit are very few.

"THE REBELLIOUS PUPIL" (Reliance), October 11.—In this number Anna Laughlin plays the part of a tomboy named Peggy. She falls in love with the new man teacher and becomes very jealous of his sister, not understanding the relationship. The school scenes are typical and the story has a number of amusing moments.

"A KNIGHT ERRANT" (Reliance), October 18.—A good child's story which will be enjoyed by older people as well. Runa, the lonely little rich girl, strikes up an acquaintance with Jimmie, a boy of the streets. He feeds her an apple through the iron gate. Later, when Runa is kidnapped, it is Jimmie who informs the police and her parents of her whereabouts. Quite an entertaining little yarn.

"TWO MEN AND A MULE" (Reliance), October 20.—A half-reel subject written by Junie McCree. Two tramps find a horse shoe, which they trade for eggs, then eggs for watermelon, and so on until they get a mule. The mule developed a very bad disposition and altogether made the picture quite amusing.

"THE LANDLADY RENTS THE ROOM" (Reliance), October 20.—As a matter of fact both the landlady and her daughter rent the same room, one to an actor and the other to a musician. They have considerable trouble before they both settle down to sleep in the same bed. A fairly good subject on same reel with above.

"CATCHEM AND KILLEM" (Apollo), October 12.—In this Fred Mace receives the necessary equipment to become a mail order detective. His antics in shadowing a couple of harmless old gentlemen, whom he believes are intending to commit wholesale murder, were quite amusing A few more complications would have strengthened the plot. As it stands it would have succeeded better as a half reel.

"BEAUTY IN THE SEA SHELL" (Thanhouser), October 19.—A fairy story of rather slight interest, in which the young hero kisses a sea shell, thus breaking the wicked magician's spell and releasing a beautiful young maiden. She interferes with his love affairs, however, and he and his sweetheart are glad to get the fairy back into the shell again. Quite a pleasing little novelty.

"A PEACEFUL VICTORY" (Thanhouser), October 17.—A strike story, in which good use is made of contrast between the rich and poor. The plot is very interesting and has a very human touch toward the close. The scenes were rather hurriedly put together in places, but this does not greatly mar the interest of the piece. William Russell and Florence La Badie play the parts of father and daughter. An entertaining number.

"THE WEDDING WRITE-UP" (Majestic), October 12.—A fairly good story handled rather weakly in places. The fickle young husband deserts his first wife and is about to take another. The first girl is society editress of a newspaper and gets hold of the wedding announcement. The husband appears to suppress the item, having tired of his second choice. Reconciliation with his first wife follows. The plot was too improbable and places the hero in a bad light.

"THE MYSTERY OF THE HAUNTED HOTEL" (Thanhouser), October 21.—This story, while well enough photographed, lacks dramatic effect and without this is not very successful for a story of its kind. The manner in which the young doctor restores the girl sleep walker to health makes a pretty love story, but the ending was abrupt.

"'CURSES,' SAID THE VILLAIN" (Nestor), October 31.—A burlesque drama of the Orient in which a rascally Turk with several accomplices tries to kidnap the bride of a young American. The powers of evil are defeated by the hero, when he lowers a sponge soaked with chloroform into a hookah which they are smoking as the plot thickens. The film contains a lot of fun and excitement.

"THE KID" (Powers), October 22.—Kathie Fischer as the "Kid," a very mischievous little girl, plays many pranks and annoys many innocent people in this little comedy of children and home life in general. The scenes in which she is discovered swimming with a lot of little boys are particularly charming. The production is commendable.

"UNDER WESTERN SKIES" (Nestor), October 22.—Al Christie produces this conventional story, the picture of which will be notable chiefly for its excellent photography and western backgrounds.

"THEIR TWO KIDS" (Nestor), October 17.—In this comedy the fun comes at the end. The "kids," of course, are two young goats, but it was the father of the newly married man who was the real goat, he being led to believe that he was a grandfather twice over.

"THE TERRIBLE OUTLAW" (Eclair), October 26.—A western comedy of somewhat conventional plot, but which nevertheless possesses considerable interest. The Eastern girl inherits a newspaper plant in Oklahoma. She decides to edit the sheet herself. Later she impersonates a noted outlaw and has all sorts of adventures.

"THEIR PARENTS" (Imp), October 9.—There is human interest as well as much laughter in this fine comedy by "Pop" Hoadley. Jane Gail is at her best, and that is saying much. Matt Moore plays the husband, and plays it well. The story is of a married couple, each of whom was born in humble circumstances, but who in the city has succeeded. When word arrives that the father of the wife is coming on a visit and also that the mother of the husband is on her way, the dissembling begins. The parts of the parents are taken by most competent players, and they materially contribute to the success of the picture. George Tucker is the producer.

"HAWKEYE'S GREAT CAPTURE" (Nestor), October 24.—A burlesque detective story of fair interest, with Lee Moran in his role of "Hawkeye."

"WHAT THE WILD WAVES DID" (Nestor), October 24.—On same reel. A beach comedy of about average interest, in which two girls wearing similar bathing suits get their love affairs mixed up.

"PLAYMATES" (Powers), October 27.—This picture is about a poor little rich girl, who longed for companionship with children. It will go over by reason of its beautiful backgrounds. It will interest many by reason of its story, although it is a difficult matter to make a tale of a child hold for a thousand feet. The work of the children is good.

"ROBERT'S LESSON" (Crystal), October 26.—Pearl White and Chester Barnett in the leads of this thrilling drama play to good effect. The story tells of one Robert who thinks he has killed a rival for his girl's hand in a fight. The interest is well sustained.

Independent Specials

"HEARTS" (Reliance), October 25.—This two-reel subject, written by Carey Lee, makes a very satisfying impression on the observer. It is not a powerful story, but it is entertaining and has a good, old-fashioned story value. The scenes, beginning at the country home of the brother and sister and later removed to the Latin quarter in Paris, develop naturally; the acting is unforced and the performers appealing in their various parts. Stanley Walpole, Rosemary Thebe, Thos. R. Mills and Sue Balfour have the leading roles. The proportion and direction are also good. A pleasing release.

"THE VAN WARDEN RUBIES" (Majestic), October 14.—Stories about missing jewels are apt to lack freshness of plot, and this two-reel offering is no exception. It contains the suspected son, the lover who plays amateur detective and the usual love interest. The story is slow in getting under way. Its chief interest lies in the pleasing ballroom scenes, the good photography and the attractive cast of performers this company has brought together. Francelia Billington and William Garwood play the leads in an acceptable manner.

"CYNTHY" (Eclair), October 20.—Miss Barbara Tennant plays the title role in this two-reel drama, which tells the story of Cynthy's rise from a drudge to a noble, sensitive woman. Some human touches in the play are very commendable and would indicate that Miss Tennant had studied her characterization. She has succeeded in making Cynthy real for us. The story is not so good as her work and this is to be regretted, for it has slightly marred an otherwise very good play. At the same time, it will be well received, we believe.

"A MAN IN THE WORLD OF MEN" (Powers), October 24.—A picture by Edwin August and in which he plays a double role. This is accomplished by satisfactory double exposure scenes and by cleverly conducting the action so that one brother may disappear just as the other comes upon the scene. Yet it seems a waste of effort, because no dramatic use is made of the similarity of the two brothers; they might better have been different actors. The picture makes a fair offering. The story is clear, is set in fine backgrounds and will keep attention awake. Yet it is a little unpleasant; the method the hero takes to help the girl whom he loves but cannot marry is not wholly commendable and many of the subtitles are sentimental. Mr. August is a good actor and is ably supported here.

"THE RESTLESS SPIRIT" (Victor), October 27. This is a three-reel drama, "suggested by Gray's Elegy," as appears in the postscript to the title, and this classic poem supplies many of the sub-titles. Mr. Kerrigan plays the lead, that of the dreamer who meets a friend in time to prevent him from attempting to realize his dreams at the cost of his wife's and child's happiness. He dreams of many careers—that of musician, statesman, warrior, captain of finance. He is turned from his dreams by the argument contained in Gray's verses—"that the paths of glory lead but to the grave." The friend who convinces him of this truth is a girl with a past, whom he meets in a desert after a narrow escape from death by thirst. The production is very elaborate, containing a number of very picturesque settings to illustrate the lines quoted from the Elegy. The drama was apparently written with an eye for these scenes, and they are the most meritorious part of the play. The story is none too strong.

"THE THUMB PRINT" (Rex), October 23.—This two-reel drama of the West is full of the spirit of outdoors. It has a lot of life and vigor. The hero is a young mining engineer in charge of a hydraulic mining outfit which figures conspicuously in the drama. The heroine is a very pretty Spanish maid to whom the cook of the camp is the pest of her life. The novel device of having the two rascals shoot one another by mistake, in the darkness, is commendable. The title is derived from the fact that the engineer is compelled to do some detective work to catch the rascals. The production is a good one of its type.

"THE BIG SISTER" (Imp), October 20.—A first class two part offering with an absorbingly interesting story, chiefly of two sisters, one of whom nearly goes wrong; but is saved in a dramatic way by the courage of "big sister." Few pictures we see are more significant or carefully logical in developing their story than is this, except perhaps at the end, which seemed weak after what had gone before. Jane Gail and Violet Mercereau play the sisters, stenographers in the same office. The former, big sister, is loved by the chief clerk (Matt Moore); but Violet is attracted by the money of the dissolute junior partner. There are many good and naturally developed contrasts; many human moments full of meaning, which often seem added by the players through imaginative understanding of the characters they portray. It is a worth while offering and exhibitors can, we think, depend upon it. It is clearly photographed. The producer is George Tucker.

"THE REAPING" (Broncho), October 25.—A two-reel story of the early West, written by C. Gardner Sullivan. The first reel gives a splendid idea of the gold excitement and the rush of prospectors across the plains. This feature alone makes the film exceptional. We think the story would have been fresher if it had followed up this lead instead of drifting back into warfare with the Indians and complicated family history, extending over a period of ten years. There are some fine scenic effects in this. The closing picture seemed a little obscure, but from the subtitle we drew the conclusion that the youth returned to his white people.

"BIG HEARTED JIM" (Eclair), October 22.—A picture, in two parts, dealing with the great Northwest. The best of it, so far as the story goes, [illegible] over the years and returned to a wild country. The photography is clear, and the exploits of the two men, bad man and R. N. W. mounted police officer, are thrilling enough to furnish good entertainment. In the opening scenes, which are set before the fireplace in a [illegible] and [illegible] a group of children around him, are charming. The lighting of them is perfect. The rays seem to come from the fire on the hearth and to wrap themselves around the group in a warm poetic glow; yet the detail of the group is perfectly photographed. The story is clear, although in character it is like others, especially of this series of rough life in the wintry forest. It will be liked and is a commendable offering.

"THE HEART OF KATHLEEN" (Domino), October 23.—A strong two-reel offering by Richard V. Spencer, with the scenes laid in Ireland. The photography is good and the acting and settings are pleasing. The characterizations of Kathleen, Robert, Dennis and Father Maloney were all good. The story makes a strong three-reel subject, and while not particularly new is full of action and is [illegible] presented.

"THE COWBOY MAGNATE" (Bison), October 25.—In this two-reel picture appear the California exhibitors who were recently guests at Universal City. Apart from the scenes of cowboy sports there is little to commend the film as entertainment. The bucking horses and the roped steers furnish some excitement. The story is nil. It seems to be thrown together to make a setting for the visitors. The more serious phases are marred by overacting. The picture is badly drawn out, so much so as to get on the nerves.

"HIS HOUR OF TRIUMPH" (Imp), October 27.—A review of this fine drama will be found in the issue of the World of October 18.

"THE GYPSY'S KISS" (Itala).—This story in two reels is more sensational than pleasant. A landowner has ordered from his estate a band of gypsies. When he gets too near Marinka, the queen, she bites his hand. Marinka makes a startling flying mount that is unusual. When the girl goes to the home of the landowner to apologize the latter is fascinated. The girl drinks with her host, but administers to him a knockout drop, thereby enabling her to escape. She falls into the hands of her own band, who have been watching her. It seems that at the girl's birth there was a prophecy that the first man to bestow upon her a kiss of love should perish within twenty-four hours and that her tribe should be desolated. As the members of the tribe believed the landlord has kissed the girl they condemn her to death at the stake. As the fire is started—with the girl very safely in the background, however—the gypsy lover in simian fashion bestows upon the girl a kiss, believing himself to be the second. He was, of course the first. According to the prophecy he must perish; and so his death is later brought about after the landlord and his friends have rescued the girl and taken her away. There are good backgrounds. The picture will have interest for many.

"BLOOD AND WATER" (Solax).—There would seem to be insufficient action and fresh incident in these two reels to justify the length of film. Darwin Karr in the makeup of an old man does good work. Playing opposite him is Mrs. Hurley, always interesting. The story is of an ambitious wife who shunts into the attic the parents of her husband and forces them to leave. When their child runs away to join her grandparents and is lost the mother comes to a realization of the wrong she has done. It is the child who effects a restoration of filial relations. The picture is not uninteresting, but, as said before, there is a feeling that the same end might have been attained more effectively in less time.

WILD ANIMALS FOR PATHEPLAYS.

Mr. J. A. Berst, general manager of Pathe Freres, has just closed contracts which assures to that well known concern a new and most interesting field for the staging of Patheplays. One contract was for a large number of wild animals which were shipped by rail, Saturday, October 11th, to St. Augustine, Fla., there being seven carloads in all. Among the animals are two elephants, two camels, two ostriches, ten lions, two tigers, six leopards, six bears, and two kangaroos, in addition to monkeys, birds, snakes (one of them a python 18 feet long), pumas, hyenas, zebras and various kinds of deer. A large farm has been rented near St. Augustine and an open air studio will erected at once. Big features only will be produced at this studio, three and four reels in length.

A company of twenty experienced players will leave for St. Augustine, October 20; among them Miss Lillian Wiggins. This company will be under the direction of Mr. Fred Wright. Three 60 ft. baggage cars are being sent express and a special Pullman car will take the players. The transportation bill alone will amount to $5,000. There was considerable difficulty experienced in the matter of shipment of the animals, as the steamship lines refused to take them.

VOTE FOR MARK DINTENFASS FOR MAYOR.

Perhaps a lot of you folks didn't know that the Hon. Mark M. Dintenfass is a candidate for Mayor of New York, but he is, just the same. Aside from the subject of motion pictures there is one tender spot in Mark's heart, and that is Taxation. In the ordinary course of business you wouldn't notice it on him, but frequently when the day's work is over he takes off his motion picture cloak and puts on the mantle of Single Tax and appears as the presiding genius among another set of people entirely. This other set styles itself the Land Value Tax Party, which is another name for what is commonly known as Single Tax. For years Mark has been a devout advocate of this propaganda and so great is his faith and understanding of it, that his many admirers in that other world of his have nominated him at the head of their distinguished ticket as their candidate for Mayor of New York.

If any man has any doubt of Mark's knowledge of his party's doctrines, and has a few spare hours, he should approach the great apostle and ask "What do you know about Single Tax?" And Mark will tell him.

EXCLUSIVE TAKES LARGER QUARTERS.

The Exclusive Supply Corporation, outgrowing its suite of offices on the tenth floor of the Candler Building, 220 West 42nd Street, New York City, last week moved across the corridor to occupy Suite 1006, the offices recently vacated by the Independent Film Co. and Warner's Features. These offices are handsomer and more elaborate than those which were previously occupied. The proximity of a projection room will be a convenience to visiting buyers.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

NEW YORK STATE CONVENTION AT ROCHESTER.

A Harmonious Gathering of Progressive Exhibitors Gets Down to Business and Starts to Build Up.

THE third annual convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of New York State, Branch No. 11, was held at the Hotel Rochester, Rochester, N. Y., on Wednesday, October 15th, with a good attendance. The first session was called to order at 11 o'clock in the morning by President A. N. Wolff. A brief statement of the purposes of the meeting was made by President M. A. Neff of the National League, who was in attendance, after which the members adjourned to meet at 1:30 P. M., and then had their pictures taken in group.

President Wolff called the afternoon session to order promptly and introduced His Honor, H. H. Edgerton, Mayor of Rochester, who welcomed the exhibitors to the city and remarked that it was in his knowledge that there had never been an occasion during his six years as chief magistrate of Rochester that anyone had censured the moving picture men of that city. The mayor's remarks were received with applause.

President Wolff thanked the mayor for his kindness in addressing the meeting and called upon Mr. Neff to respond, which he did in a few well-chosen remarks. The convention then went into executive session. The minutes of the last meeting held at Syracuse, N. Y., were read by Secretary F. E. Samuels and approved.

President Neff addressed the convention at some length on the present condition of the League, and among other things observed that the National League was never in better condition than at the present.

The session continued until 5 o'clock, during which various matters of immediate concern of the League were discussed. The convention adjourned to meet at 10 o'clock Thursday morning.

In the evening the members visited several picture theaters and other places of amusement. A special exhibition of advance releases was given at the Hotel Rochester at 8 P. M.

On Thursday the entire party was entertained by the Eastman Kodak Company in the afternoon, and a luncheon and entertainment took place at the Hotel Rochester in the evening.

Officers and members present were: President A. N. Wolff, Colonial Theater, Rochester; 2d Vice-President F. C. Pierce, Geneva; Secretary F. E. Samuels, New York; Treasurer W. C. Hubbard, Monroe Theater, Rochester; Attorney Tobias Keppler, New York; National President M. A. Neff, Cincinnati; George J. Wunder, Hudson Theater; J. Greenstone, Empire Theater; E. A. Westcott, Venice Theater; Henry F. Kurtz, Lyric Theater; Harry F. Wick, Lincoln Theater; Claude L. Jones, Park Theater; G. L. Tyler, Grand Theater; Fred C. Gerling, Knickerbocker Theater; Frank I. Simpson, Princess Theater; B. N. Sherwood, Fitzhugh Hall; F. W. Esterheld, Eagle Theater; John J. Tarren and H. C. Kelly, Victoria Theater; Morris Leftkowitz, Plaza Theater; George Caffery, Clinton Theater; Ellis A. Wolff, Palace Theater; William Minder, Manhattan Theater; William A. Calihan, Hippodrome Theater; Joseph A. Briggs, Jefferson Theater; Thomas A. Aspenleiter, all of Rochester. E. M. Day, Motion World, Auburn; Henry Klinger, Oliver Theater, North Tonawanda; C. A. Brook, Orpheum Theater, Baldwinsville; J. L. Davis, Amusu Theater, Binghamton; A. S. Purchase, Lyceum Theater, Syracuse; Geo W. Foster, Photoplay, Cuba; W. Habersat, Albion; M. L. Fleischman, Seventh Avenue Theater; Jay Leigh Wolf, Nicoland Theater; Sidney Ascher, New York City; A. A. Fennyvessy, Rochester.

Manufacturers' exhibits were made by the Wurlitzer Company, the Nicholas Power Company, the Simplex Company, the Newman Manufacturing Company, the Gundlach-Manhattan Company; the Helio Screen, and Bausch & Lomb Company. Mr. Geo. Blair, of the Eastman Kodak Company, and Mr. F. K. Hart, of the Fireproof Film Company, visited with the delegates.

Posters for the All-Star production, "Arizona," Warner's Features, the Universal, Mutual and General Film Companies were shown in the hotel lobby.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA EXHIBITORS ELECT OFFICERS.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of the District of Columbia held their annual meeting on Thursday, October 9, 1913, and unanimously elected all their former officers as follows: Wm. P. Herbst, president; Ira LaMotte, 1st vice-president; V. H. Stonesifer, 2d vice-president; A. C. Joy, treasurer, and Fulton Brylawski, secretary. Mr. Brylawski is also the National Vice-President from the District of Columbia. The Board of Directors for the ensuing year are as follows: Wm. P. Herbst, Ira LaMotte, V. H. Stonesifer, A. C. Joy, Fulton Brylawski, Thomas M. Eastwood, Joseph P. Morgan and A. H. Crandall. Leo Rover, Nathan Stein, Wm. Jasper and the president and secretary were appointed as a Publicity Committee. The regular standing committees were continued in being and J. P. Morgan was elected sergeant-at-arms.

EXECUTIVE AND CONVENTION COMMITTEE, NEW YORK STATE MEETING.

Top row, left to right—George Wunder, 1st vice-president; Jules Greenstone, 2d vice-president; G. L. Tyler, press committee; F. C. Pierce, exhibit committee. Lower row—J. J. Farren, press committee. W. A. Calihan, secretary; A. N. Wolff, president; F. C. Gerling, press committee, W. C. Hubbard, treasurer.

The League has held regular monthly meetings since the date of its inception and is a duly incorporated body under the laws of the District of Columbia. Its meetings are well attended and all its members have worked harmoniously together for the betterment of the motion picture business.

A banquet was given by the League on October 16, which was well attended.

MEETING OF EXHIBITORS OF GREATER NEW YORK.

A meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York was held in their rooms, 136 Third Avenue, on Thursday, October 9th, Samuel H. Trigger presiding.

When the meeting had been duly opened and the secretary's report had been read and adopted, Mr. Grant W. Anson, treasurer of the organization, stated that the profits accruing from the exposition amounted to $8,295, out of which $2,750 had been sent to the National League to pay the railroad fare of the National vice-presidents who attended the New York Convention, at the rate of five cents per mile one way. Two hundred and sixty ($260) dollars in cash and checks had been paid to Mr. Clem Kerr and Mr. Lou R. Thomas, and one hundred and fifty ($150) dollars counsel fees, the balance of $5,135 was paid to the New York Local, out of which a check for $2,567.50 had been paid to Mr. Davis, treasurer of the New York State Exhibitors' Association, and another check of $600, being the per capita tax due to the State Association by the New York City Local.

After the treasurer's report had been accepted as read, the following resolutions were unanimously carried:

That, Whereas the fire risks in a picture theater have become practically nil and the insurance rates retained for same are a higher percentage than those of any other business, be it

Resolved, That a committee wait on the Board of Fire Underwriters and endeavor to adjust matters so that we may have an equitable and just rate as compared to other lines of business. Committee appointed: Mr. Hollander, Mr. Landau, Mr. Edward Vakensi, Frank Tichenor, J. A. Koerpel, Mr. Tisch.

That, Whereas the old block system of procuring a program whereby the exhibitors had a full knowledge of what reels they were to receive a week or ten days in advance and, whereas, the said block system has not been in use by a number of exchanges, and there are quite some petty annoyances in a number of the exchanges, owing to the exhibitors being unable to secure their programs in time to open their theaters, be it

Resolved, That a committee wait on the managers of all exchanges and endeavor to have a system inaugurated whereby all reels can be collected at night and they can then be ready for delivery early the following morning, and also to ask said managers whether or not the old block system would meet with their approval as we consider it very essential to our business and mutually beneficial to both manufacturers, exchanges and exhibitors. Committee appointed: Mr. Lee A. Ochs, Mr. C. R. Martineau, Mr. Bauerenfreund and Mr. S. H. Trigger.

Following the passage of these resolutions the chairman of the ball committee, Mr. A. Coleman, stated that he had sold over one thousand tickets and several boxes for the ball to be held December 15th, at Terrace Garden. Mr. Wm. Brandt, chairman of the program committee, reported progress.

MEETING OF EAST NEW YORK EXHIBITORS.

A meeting of the East New York branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York was held at the Empire Theater, No. 11A Sumpter Street, Brooklyn, on Monday night, October 13th; William A. Hollander in the chair.

There were forty-five local members present and several speakers were given the courtesy of the floor and spoke on the forthcoming municipal campaign and the effects it will have on business in general and the motion picture industry in particular.

A committee appointed at the last meeting to report on all East New York theaters in reference to number of reels run and the admission fee, stated that all exhibitors in that section were running four reels of pictures for five cents, and on Saturdays and Sundays were running five reels for ten cents, and that the whole of the East New York organization were working in harmony and unison.

The meeting was adjourned to meet Monday, October 20th, at the Jefferson Casino, 474 Hamburg Avenue, Brooklyn.

CLEVELAND EXHIBITORS' MEETING.

On Friday afternoon, Edward Kohl, president of Cleveland Local, Branch No. 1 of the M. P. E. L. of A., issued an official call for local meeting to be held at the Hollenden Hotel, 11 A. M., Monday, October 13th. The meeting was well attended, and the action of those members who voted to give up the charter was repudiated by the loyal members of the local, which stood by Mr. Kohl and the local league.

The opening meeting was adjourned by President Kohl, and a recess taken for five minutes, when the Convention went into executive session and elected the following officers to serve until the first day of January, 1914: President, Edward Kohl, National Theater; 1st vice-president, S. E. Simmons, Dreamland Theater; 2nd vice-president, Louis Beck, Mall Theater; Treasurer, Geo. Heimnback, Superior Theater; Secretary, W. H. Horsay, Carlyon Theater; Corresponding Secretary, Chas. A. MacGown, Cameraphone Theater; Sargeant-at-Arms, F. J. Schad, Gordon Park Theater.

A committee was elected to pass upon all applications that should ask for membership in the league, and no exhibitor in Cleveland can join the local unless he is a bona fide motion picture exhibitor.

A committee on Constitution and By-Laws was appointed to report amendments to the present local Constitution, as it was discovered that there were parts of the old local Constitution that conflicted with the State and National Constitution.

The meeting closed with everybody enthusiastic, and a bright future predicted for the league from now on by reason of the elimination of the element which has retarded the progress and effectiveness of the league, and everybody is determined to go to work with a will, and instead of Cleveland local being the fifth largest in the State, it is confidentially expected to make it the biggest local in the State before January next, when local officers are elected again. It was voted to go to the big Convention, which will be held in January at Cincinnati, and that a fund would be pooled to pay the expense of not less than 25 members.

SOME CLEVELAND EXHIBITORS WITHDRAW.

Giving as their reason the activity of President Neff in behalf of the state censorship plan and his support of the law now on the statute books of Ohio, several members of the Cleveland Local of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of the State of Ohio resolved, at a meeting held Oct. 1, to surrender their charter in the state organization and withdraw from the League and to reorganize independently thereof.

CALIFORNIA EXHIBITORS LIMIT SERVICE.

By an agreement with the film exchanges doing business in the state of California, the Exhibitors' League of that state has arranged a schedule of service calling for three one thousand foot reels for a five cent admission and not more than five reels for a ten cent admission. It is also agreed that special features may not be shown in addition to regular program and that exhibitors securing such special features shall deduct a similar number of reels from his regular program. Exhibitors violating these provisions may be cancelled by the exchange serving them.

BEST SOLUTION FOR CENSORSHIP QUESTION.

The best solution for the question of censorship of motion pictures that has yet been proposed by an exhibitor is offered by President J. S. Phillips, of the Texas League in a letter to the members of the organization in his state. He first urges every manager to establish a personal censorship over his own theater and then urges him to run only such pictures as have been approved by the National Board of Censorship. These are wise words and the best that have yet been uttered by an official of the exhibitors' league.

MEETING OF MASSACHUSETTS EXHIBITORS.

"Some time" was had by the members of the exhibitors of Massachusetts on the evening of Oct. 7, at the Hotel Dreyfus, Boston, where a fine dinner was properly disposed of. Under the direction of President Ernest Horstman, there was some speechmaking to which the following contributed: Henry Wasserman, Joseph Mack, J. A. Eslow, R. D. Marson, George J. Appleby, Harry Asher, Edward Farrell and Herman Rifkin. After the dinner the party attended a performance at the Casino theater. A final feature was a late supper at Haywards Cafe.

RESPECT FOR THE LATE MAYOR GAYNOR.

Resolutions adopted by Pittsburgh Local, Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania, on October 8.

Whereas, Almighty God in his infinite wisdom knows best, has taken from our midst one whom all that knew him, loved and admired, and we say that William J. Gaynor is dead in the flesh only, as man's ideas will live long after he has left us, and we say that in the minds of the liberty-loving people William J. Gaynor will never die, and

Whereas we, the members of the Motion picture Exhibitors' League have lost a friend and champion and the people of the United States have been called upon to mourn the loss of a man who expressed in his every official action the keystone of American institutions and liberties. A man that had confidence in the people and expressed his ideas of liberties in this language: "There is no man or set of men that has any right to tell us what we shall read or say, or what kind of entertainment we shall witness, as I believe the people know best what is good or not good"; therefore be it

Resolved, That we extend to the bereaved family of the deceased William J. Gaynor our heartfelt sympathy and condolence in their hours of sadness, and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the family of the deceased. Also to all the trade journals and a copy be spread upon the minutes of this organization, and be it further

Resolved, that our charter be draped, in memory of our deceased friend for a period of thirty days.

At a meeting of the Moving Picture Exhibitors Local of Reading, Pa.

HELD SEPTEMBER 18, 1913.

We received with profound regret the intelligence of the departure of the Hon. Wm. J. Gaynor

We, as well as every one connected with the

Moving Picture Industry

MEMORY

Sentiments of the Reading, Pa., exhibitors forwarded to the family of New York's late Mayor.

TEXAS LEAGUE DIRECTORS TO MEET.

A meeting of the Board of Directors of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Texas, will be held at Dallas, on Monday, October 27. Members of the league are invited to meet with the board and to state their troubles, if any, at that meeting. The management of the Dallas Fair Association has named that date as Motion Picture Exhibitors' League Day and any exhibitor who has a picture of his home town is requested to bring it with him for exhibition at the fair on that day.

Report on General Film Exclusive Service

The announcement made last week by the General Film Company that Exclusive Service would become a fact on October 13th was received with enthusiasm. Over three hundred letters of request for rates and information were received at the special offices of the Exclusive Department, at 71 West 23rd Street, the sixth day following the publication of the Exclusive Service advertisement in the trade papers. These letters which continue to pour in with every mail bear the post marks of cities and towns in every section of the country. The idea seems to be equally popular with the big and the little exhibitor. The former seeing in it a means of enlarging and holding his patronage and the latter rejoicing over the prospect of having the "Regular" program all to himself.

With this regard the General Film Company wishes to emphasize this most important point: That its regular program will not be in the slightest degree affected by the make-up of the exclusive program, which is, at the present time, made up of the best that the manufacturers are able to produce. The Exclusive program will be made possible by the manufacturers turning out additional new material of a standard which is already keyed up to the highest pitch.

For the first time in the history of the trade will be possible to secure a regular service of high-class picture programs that can only be seen in one house in each district for a period of ninety days. Under the new plan of the General Film Company a manager will be able to advertise his picture program as extensively as he pleases, with the positive assurance that the business thus created will not be divided with any other house which may be showing pictures. It should also be possible, with a standard high-class program of single and multiple reels which are as exclusive to his house as any particular play would be, for the exhibitor to charge a fairly high rate of admission. On the other hand, it should be distinctly understood that the exclusive service plan, while it will be a boon to the large theaters and a big money maker for those who are fortunate enough to secure it, will in no way interfere with the business and welfare of the regulation picture houses now using licensed service, as the General Film Company will not contract to furnish either Exclusive Service or Regular Service to any kind of a theater or "house" which would directly conflict with the exhibitors who are already using General Film Service.

Moving Picture Educator

The Moving Picture Helping Weak Children.

REVITALIZING devitalized children by means of a scientific use of ordinary methods of school work has been done by Walter W. Reach, M. D., a Philadelphia School Supervising Medical Inspector. The test is made according to his description as follows:

> The effect of [illegible] fresh air is to [illegible] play, excited demand for increased [illegible]. [illegible] periods devoted to [illegible] deep breathing, never prolonged, however, to produce fatigue [illegible] at any one time to excite perspiration.

The Result in an Educational Film.

For the purpose of illustrating a paper read by the writer at the Fourth International Congress on School Hygiene at Buffalo in August permission was secured from the parents and, through the courtesy of the school authorities, we took a motion picture of the Bache school children at class. This moving picture shows actual school-room conditions and the exercises. Such can be copied and taught by any teacher once they are fixed in the mird. It is an educational film, produced for the good it may do, and is at the disposal of any committee seriously engaged in an effort to secure an open air class for children who need such schooling.

How These Beneficial Results May Be Passed.

Almost any manager of a motion picture house will accommodate such a committee by running the reel in private to explain the idea to school board members or parents. This only requires about ten minutes, as the exercises are abbreviated to show the principles involved for a definite end. The other requirements are transportation charges, prompt and safe return of the film with a proportionate cost of the wear and tear to replace it, for it is calculated that the celluloid film has a limited life, based upon the number of times it is used for exhibition purposes.

Religious Editors Views.

In our last issue we gave an exhaustive analysis of an important declaration, favorable to the moving picture, made by Dr. Bishop, an eminent Grand Rapids clergyman. The editor of The Congregationalist and Christian Work in which Dr. Bishop's article appeared, says:

> Dr. Bishop's comprehensive and graphic survey, on other pages of this issue, of the moving picture industry, gathers up a large number of interesting and significant facts concerning a popular diversion which the churches cannot ignore or neglect. The Congregationalist and Christian World through a special investigation by one of its editors printed in July, 1910, was one of the first journals to call attention to the amazingly rapid development of the industry and the hold it was already obtaining upon the popular mind. It was then stated that two and a quarter million people in this country were daily attending picture exhibitions. The total daily attendance at present now far exceeds that figure and there are no signs of abatement of interest. Mr. Thomas A. Edison, in a special article prepared for us three years ago, said: "Motion pictures have already had a tremendous educational effect. This is true of the seemingly purely amusement motion pictures. Little [illegible] shown in them, staged and acted immensely better than are the cheap shows given at considerably higher prices. When to these are added the thousands of historical, industrial, scientific and scenic motion pictures which have been shown in the past fifteen years, it is obvious that the motion picture is an important factor in the world's intellectual development."
> From many quarters, East and West, North and South, we hear of adaptations of the picture show in the interest of morality and religion. The account by Dr. Bishop of the way in which his strong church in Grand Rapids has utilized the films on Sunday afternoon is one of the first definite statements of the effect of such an exhibition upon a local congregation. We shall soon print other articles describing similar efforts in other localities.
> To what extent the church should experiment in this direction is a matter concerning which we could not advise without knowledge of local conditions. We do not expect to see any large number of churches undertaking this form of popular entertainment. Like an evangelistic campaign, the ultimate value of moving pictures must be determined, not by the immediate increase of the congregation, but by the permanent effect upon mind, manners and morals. Yet we are glad that some of the churches, especially those of the down-town type, are venturing in this field. It is at least proof that such churches have initiative, courage and a desire by some means or other to extend the field of their ministrations.
> But the Christian forces of the land can make themselves influential in [illegible] the moving picture industry in other ways than by establishing plants under their own roof. They can combine and carry on indirectly the right sort of entertainment at popular resorts as some [illegible] in St. Louis have been doing this last summer. Then there is the large field of censorship where the church ought to make itself felt.

It is a source of great gratification to the Moving Picture Educator to reprint this strong editorial following the equally strong article written by Dr. Bishop. The anticipated time has come, when truth and justice associated with true broad-minded religion, measures, free from prejudice and bigotry, the true length and breadth, height and depth, the full value of kinematography, not only in its relation to religious work, but to its universal educative possibilities, and still further its wider pleasure-giving scope. It will be a pleasure to look forward to other religious papers as they follow the example set by The Congregationalist, as it is by such righteous methods as these that the greatest possible good is secured in a proper way for the greatest possible number.

"From the Blackboard to the Film."

Under this heading the School Journal, one of the recognized organs of the educational world, has in its recent issue a commendable article emphasized by an editorial note on the great advance made from the primitive uses of the blackboard in the old country school-house of our fathers to the use of the educational film of the moving picture in the classrooms of their sons.

The Old Way.

> "Write about something you have seen," our teachers used to tell us, when the dreaded day for compositions came around. And we sat and chewed our lead-pencils and kicked our feet against the floor and racked our brains in vain effort to obey. Our experience was too limited. What had we ever seen, anyhow, that was worth describing?

The New Way.

> But the child whose school has a motion picture equipment will never lack for subject matter for his literary efforts. The wonders of nature are an open book to him. He has seen plant life unfold, step by step, from its creation to its final development; he has followed insect life through its startling changes; he has seen wild animals, birds and fishes in their native haunts; historical scenes, planned with absolute fidelity to detail, have unrolled before him; every corner of the earth, every marvel of art and science are accessible to his eager eyes.

This graphic description is self-convincing and is a double proof of the greater yet more than simplified methods and value of present day teaching. Not only from the blackboard to the film do we find increasing helpfulness from moving picture teaching but its supplemental powers in every branch of illustrative learning are as legion as they are universal.

EDISON COMPANY RETURNS FROM MAINE.

The company of Edison players which has been working, during the past summer, in the vicinity of Searsport, Maine, has just returned to the Bronx studio. The departure of the players for home was the occasion of much merrymaking on the part of the people of Searsport. Judge J. B. Black made a farewell address and concluded with presenting Mary Fuller, the leading woman of the company, with a bound copy of the history of the 26th Maine Volunteers, of which he was a member. A banner inscribed "Good-bye Mary Fuller" was hung across the principal street and the school children carried banners bearing the inscription -"Good-bye Mary."

The company was under the direction of Walter Edwin and included Mary Fuller, Bliss Milford, Elsie MacLeod, Augustus Phillips, Frank McGlynn, Richard Neill, John Sturgeon and Harry Beaumont.

NEW HELEN GARDNER PICTURES.

"A Princess of Bagdad," the new Helen Gardner picture which will be ready for delivery October 25th, is an Arabian Nights story 8,500 feet in length. It has already attracted much attention, and many inquiries for territory have been received. The story is most interestingly told, the costuming extremely handsome and the photography perfect

The picture now in course of production is "A Daughter of Pan," a purely fanciful story based on ancient mythology in which Miss Gardner is seen in the role of Dusa, a daughter of the Sylvan gods, beautiful to them but homely to the less perfect sight of mortals. The story, laid in the earliest period of the world's history, when the virgin forests, untouched by the hand of man, were still in their primeval perfection, affords opportunity for many beautiful woodland views. The part of Dusa was written especially for Miss Gardner and is peculiarly adapted to her.

WILLIS OPENS A FEATURE OFFICE.

F. J. Willis has resigned from the Mutual Film Corporation to assume the management of the newly organized Manufacturers' Film Agency, Inc., which will deal exclusively in the rental of feature films, with offices in the Candler Building on 42nd Street, New York. Mr. Willis has been with the Mutual since its inception, in charge of the arranging of programs for the branch offices, and in this capacity gained a deep insight into the demands of exhibitors.

MME. POLAIRE IN PICTURES.

Mme. Polaire, who likes to be called the homeliest woman in the world and who arrived in New York a few weeks ago mourning the loss of a pet pig which jumped overboard en route, is to appear in pictures. The "Features Ideal" from the Parisian studio, soon to be released have madam in a particularly interesting subject. A review will appear in these columns later.

KLEINE ENLARGES OFFICES.

In addition to occupying practically the entire third floor at 166 N. State Street, Chicago, and a large suite of offices in the Long Acre Building, New York City, General Manager McCarahan has been compelled to rent a number of other suites on the fourth floor, despite the fact that almost all the available space on that floor is already occupied by the various departments of the big Kleine organization. An entire six story building at 20 East Illinois Street is given over exclusively to the photograph department and the store rooms of the Kleine Optical Company. The Kleine Chicago force has tripled in size in the past six months.

SPECIAL ENGAGEMENT OF WINIFRED KINGSTON.

Winifred Kingston, who has been playing the lead in the Cort-Morosco production of "The Elixir of Youth," has been engaged by the All Star Feature Corporation to play the role of Madame Alvarez in its forthcoming production of "The Soldiers of Fortune." Miss Kingston is English and, previous to her appearance in "The Elixir of Youth," was seen in this country in "The Man Who Found the Way," supporting Cyril Scott; as Marjoline in "Pomander Walk"; supported Henry Miller in "The Servant in the House," and was with William Hawtrey in "Dear Old Billy."

TO AVOID CONFUSION.

The Itala Film Company of America announces that it is in no way connected with the Italian-American Film Company, whose offices are said to be in the Columbia Theater Building, where the Itala offices formerly were. Much confusion has arisen on account of the similarity in the names. The Itala Film Company of America now has its offices in the Candler Building, New York City, and all communications should be addressed to that address.

Edison Players in England.

Seated in front are Charles Brabin, director; Miss Miriam Nesbitt, Marc MacDermott and Miss Bessie Bannon, secretary to Mr H G Plimpton. The rest of the group are English players who have been working with the company regularly. Among the productions made by this company are "The Coast Guard's Sister," "Keepers of the Flock," "Flood Tide," "The Stroke of the Phoebus Eight," "A Daughter of Romany," "The Foreman's Treachery," and others. Both Mr. Brabin and Mr. MacDermott are of English nativity. Miss Nesbitt has also played several engagements on the English stage.

"A Life for a Life"

Beautiful Backgrounds and an Unusually Good Story Make a Recent F. R. A. Three-Part Offering Noteworthy.

By H. C. Judson.

THE opening scenes of this picture reminded us of that beautiful idyll of Goethe's, "Herman and Dorethia." The action is laid in Germany and we find a German farmer's son pleading on behalf of a beautiful refugee and her aged father who had been cast out of their home and left in poverty by troubled times. The farmer relents and the refugees are taken to the simple home to be thenceforth a part of the family. It is winter and we are given glimpses of life in a rural German community a hundred years ago; the date is given as 1813. We meet a few of the neighbors, see the kitchen of the farmhouse, its yard and fields with a mountain in the background covered with snow, country roads, and the edge of a thick pine forest. These things are well photographed and are as lovely as they can be.

It is Christmas morning following the arrival of the refugees that an officer enters and warns the son of the family that he is ordered to report to his regiment. There's a sincerely acted love scene and a parting scene and the youth goes off to the war. In February, the postman brings to the girl a letter saying that her sweetheart is wounded and a prisoner of the enemy. The sorrow of the family is acted with restraint and also convinces. At night the girl slips away and, on the family horse, goes with the determination of freeing her lover. In her adventures, she meets many characters and all of these are humanly drawn and add greatly to the exciting story of how she finds and frees the young German soldier only to be captured herself and finally to see him retaken in the attempt to rescue her. The title comes from the highly tragic ending of the picture in which she has been made to believe that blank cartridges will be used when her lover is shot against the wall and that she will be permitted to escape with him. It makes a touching scene when she witnesses his actual execution and finds out the truth. She then takes the life of the general who had deceived her, an exchange of his life for her lover's. It is an unusual offering, dignified and worthy. We dare commend it highly for all audiences, but particularly for discriminating spectators.

"THE PLOWMAN HOMEWARD PLODS HIS WEARY WAY."

It is said that this line from Gray's Elegy can be transposed in more different forms, without impairing its meaning, than any sentence known in English literature. Bigelow Cooper, of the Edison Co., says, no matter how many ways it is twisted about, it is still the most eloquent bit he ever heard, with emphasis on "Homeward" and "Weary." But don't take him too seriously on this point. He evidently wants us to believe that he did all the plowing shown in the picture, and strikes a most convincing attitude of a weary plowman in an endeavor to get our sympathy. But remember that he is "some" actor and from an intimate personal knowledge of Bigelow, we think the real "weary plowman" is just outside the picture to the right. One thing about it is real, however. Cooper does own the farm and team.

NOTES OF THE TRADE.

BEN WILSON was surprised and delighted on receiving a letter from the Transvaal, South Africa, speaking in glowing terms of his work and begging for a photo. In the same mail the popular Edison player received a letter from a mother out in Sterling, Ill., whose six-year-old daughter had announced that when she grew up she was going to marry Ben Wilson, "cause he was the nicest man she ever saw." And that cost him another photograph.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"IN THE DAYS OF TRAJAN" (American).

The "Flying A" two part production under this title is one of the masterpieces of modern cinematography. For accuracy in detail of costuming and settings it is unexcelled. The natural beauties of Santa Barbara millionaire homes have been utilized in this production and the subject is in accord with the record of historians of known reputation.

Lorimer Johnston as the author of the scenario and the producer of the play is deserving of much credit. Warren Kerrigan as Decebalus, the Prince of Dacia, renders excellent dramatic work. The same can be said of George Periolat, who plays Emperor Trajan, Jack Richardson, the Prefect of Rome, and the other leads as given in the cast.

Scene from "In the Days of Trajan" (American).

The story is of the period about 100 A. D. and opens in the Garden of Rome. Incidents of court intrigue preface the appearance of the Queen of Dacia (Louise Lester) and other prisoners of war. Scenes of the dungeons and the arena during a Roman holiday are vividly portrayed. The attack on the Emperor by Decebalus (Kerrigan) and the rescue by Princess Octavia (Vivian Rich), who is in love with Decebalus, form a striking feature of the production. The escape of Decebalus from the dungeons and his subsequent enlistment with the Roman forces against the Huns is very realistically presented and is followed by his betrothal to Octavia. The film is scheduled for release October 27th.

"HEARTS" (Reliance).

How cruel and heartless one woman can act toward another without any good reason that a mere man's mind is capable of comprehending, lays the cornerstone for this deeply absorbing two part drama, which appeals strongly and strangely to the emotional side of the average mind.

The woman who hates in "Hearts" is a wealthy mother-in-law. The one who suffers is the object of this hatred—a sweet, simple, country maiden, whose only sin has been her beautiful love and honorable marriage to this woman's worthy son.

Circumstances bring about a fatal misunderstanding between the girl and her devoted husband, which leads to her going away to suffer alone. The son soon learns that he has made a great mistake and searches in vain to find the girl and atone for his mental blindness. How they finally come together in a foreign land and are happily reunited forms a fitting climax for this excellently named heart-interest drama.

With Rosemary Theby and Thomas Mills supported by Stanley Walpole, Sue Balfour, and a strong cast, "Hearts" will be released on Saturday, October 25.

"DODGING MATRIMONY" (Patheplay).

This is a comedy that is good for many a laugh. Brooks is fond of fishing, but wind, tide and mischance conspire one day to prevent him from getting home at anything but an indecent hour. Mrs. Brooks, naturally sour of temper, pours the overfull vials of her wrath upon her husband's unlucky head. Poor Brooks feels that this is the last straw so when, a short time after, he receives word that his brother in the west has died he endeavors to make use of it to free himself of the termagant spouse. He goes fishing again and asks his friends to report to his wife that he has been drowned. Unfortunately for him the success of his scheme induces him to "celebrate" his reported wet death with an equally damp celebration, so he finds himself in jail where he masquerades as his dead brother. Unfortunately for him the beard which he had shaved to "disguise" himself persists in growing and he is recognized at last and meets with his marital punishment. The release date is Oct. 22.

POIRET FASHIONS IN KINEMACOLOR.

M. Paul Poiret, the famous French coutouriere who came over to tell American women what to wear, admits that he learned a few tricks of the trade in New York. In the first place, while Madame Poiret is his favorite model when he is designing a gown, he finds that American models can wear them with grace and effect—extreme though they be in style. Furthermore, while M. Poiret uses some Paris-made moving pictures to illustrate his lectures, in Kinemacolor he has found the ideal medium for the display of his costume creations in all their color combinations and texture of fabrics.

Arrangements have been made by William H. Hickey, general manager of the European Kinemacolor companies, to take first-view motion pictures of all the spring styles designed in M. Poiret's Paris studios, and show the same in American theaters having the Kinemacolor fashion service. The first of the Poiret fashion reels to be released will be shown at the Regent Theater, New York, next week.

"A MESSAGE FROM MARS" SELLING WELL.

Marcus Loew has booked "A Message from Mars" in all of his theaters. James McEnery is in New York representing the U. K. Film Company, which owns the film, and reports that very little territory is left to dispose of. New Jersey, Greater New York and other territory has been disposed of, including the entire Pacific Coast, Eastern Pennsylvania and the whole of the New England country.

"THE EVIL EYE" (Lubin).

A very strange story of old Mexico and the dangerous superstition of the Peon classes of years ago. The scenes are truly Mexican and the atmosphere of the locale very picturesque. The picture is made at the Lubin studio on the Mexican border and employs a big number of the native peasantry.

Don Alma Bondadoso, who had long been away from his native home, has sent word to his steward that he is about to return to his castle for the purpose of erasing superstition and teaching the word of God. A newspaper prints a warning to the natives and tells the story of how in his boyhood he had met an enraged mountain lion and with the power of his eye had escaped unharmed. Since which Alma has been known as "He of the Evil Eye," and always held in fear. Upon the Don's arrival the people are warned against him by Don Immenso Superstisioso and his daughter's sweetheart, Ocioso Ignorante and the girl is carefully watched. She, however, is curious and rushes into the thick of the fray, and meeting the cursed one, is fascinated. Later she cultivates his acquaintance and finding him a superior man, falls in love with Alma. Sobre's father demands that she shall marry Ocioso, but she declares herself that she will marry the one most worthy. Alma rises clear above the darkness and ignorance of the people, and enveloping the girl with the halo of his own soul.

Scene from "The Evil Eye" (Lubin).

"LIFE OF SAINT PATRICK."

Phil P. Benedict is offering to state right buyers a four part production entitled the "Life of Saint Patrick," a version of the legendary story of the patron Saint of Ireland. Overlooking some inconsequential defects in the photography there is much in this picture to interest that class of the American public who are concerned in subjects of a distinctly Roman Catholic nature. How true the events in the life of Saint Patrick are the scenes depicted can only be conjectured, yet they possess interest and, furthermore, they are said to have been taken in Ireland near the points believed to have been frequented by the saintly man during life. Many interesting views of Ireland are given.

This subject should have staple value for rental to Roman Catholic societies. As a matter of fact, it has been highly applauded by the members of a number of such societies in and near New York to whom it has been shown. Advantageous terms are being offered by Mr. Benedict, who can be addressed at 1402 Broadway, New York.

"AT THE WHEEL" (Great Northern Special).

This is a most interesting and exciting photodrama in three parts which carries with the flavor of adventures on the sea as well as an absorbing story enacted on land. According to the story as depicted on the film, Miller, who is the first officer on the steamship "Elma," is in love with Kitty Bey. With the consent of his employers, his fiancee is permitted to make a voyage on the ship and there she meets Captain Fisher, who at once is attracted by her charms. They have many secret meetings on the ship, but the old boatswain is on the alert and informs young Miller of the danger that is confronting him. Soon thereafter, Miller discovers the captain embracing Kitty and in a moment of frenzy he fires several shots into the cabin. Neither the captain or Miss Kitty are hit by the bullets, but the captain orders Young Miller placed in irons. At this juncture we see a furious fight on the deck of the vessel, Miller's object being to toss the captain into the sea.

Miller serves a term of imprisonment and upon his release learns that Kitty has become the wife of Captin Fisher. During a reception, Mrs. Fisher becomes enamored of Brenner, a dashing young chap who is engaged in the shipping business. They make a rendezvous on a motor boat and Miller follows on their trail. Now follow several exciting moments. Miller takes possession of the motor boat and heads her seaward. When Mrs. Miller and her companion emerge from the cabin, they are confronted by Miller, who holds a revolver in his hand and while steering the boat, he pulls the plugs from the bottom and sinks the craft. The three are drowned and the body of Miller is washed up on the shore. Kitty Bey, the boatswain's daughter and her first love, drags him to the beach and there the story ends.

Scene from "At the Wheel" (Gt. Northern Special).

The photoplay is splendidly acted by the stars of the Great Northern forces, and while the theme is morbid at intervals there is sufficient excitement to carry it through successfully.

"THE OATH OF O'TSURU SAN" (Majestic).

Manager Lucius Henderson, of the Majestic studios in Los Angeles, has just finished a magnificent two-reel Anglo-Japanese romance "The Oath of O'Tsuru San." Special scenery was painted for this production and elegantly embroidered costumes, which had actually come from Japan, were procured. The Japanese stage settings were under the supervision of Miss Tsuru Aoki, who played the title role, and great pains were taken to have all of the sets authentic and correct in detail. William Garwood played the leading male role of Ned Winthrop, inventor of torpedo boats and O'Tsuru's lover, while Wm. Nigh, the author, played Yokosawa, a high Japanese Government official. Altogether the play is up to the usual high standard of Majestic productions.

THE GOPHER FILM MFG. COMPANY.

Above is the title of a corporation controlled by J. V. Bryson of Minneapolis. They are releasing a reel each week of topical subjects under the title of Gopher Interstate Review, which is meeting with considerable demand in adjacent territory. We understand regular posters in one sheet size can be furnished.

"ZUMA THE GYPSY" (Kleine-Cines).

Not since "Quo Vadis?" has George Kleine offered the American market a subject of such rare power as "Zuma the Gypsy," the Kleine-Cines release in two parts for Nov. 4.

Of those many essentials which go toward making the exception, "Zuma the Gypsy" possesses all. The story is strikingly pathetic, strongly human and the acting a really remarkable bit of character work. Marie Hesperia, well known in America for her splendid work in spectacular Cines subjects plays Zuma, the gypsy, convincingly.

Scene from "Zuma the Gypsy" (Kleine-Cines).

A snake charmer, with a wandering gypsy circus, beaten by her masters until she runs away and then adopted by a kind-hearted count and his wife, Zuma against her will falls in love with the count. Rather than prove traitorous to her mistress, Zuma commits suicide by allowing a giant python to bite her after finishing a dance at a private ball given by the count. Her dog-like devotion to the count and his wife represents the uttermost in clever character work and her daring handling of the sixteen foot snake shows a degree of personal bravery not often seen. The photography is splendid from title to tail-piece and the action of the story moves amid settings notable for their great depth and luxury of appointment.

KINEMACOLOR OFFERING CHEAPER SERVICE.

An interesting announcement was made this week by the Kinemacolor Company of America through its general manager, A. H. Sawyer. Mr. Sawyer announces that beginning October 20th, the makers of the colored motion pictures will be in a position to offer a class of service new to Kinemacolor exhibitors. Price of this service will range from $20.00 upwards.

The Kinemacolor Company has mapped out a very unique scheme and the prices are so arranged that the exhibitors in the smallest towns will be able to use Kinemacolor as an added feature on their regular programs.

The Kinemacolor Company is now practically a year ahead on subjects, so that any exhibitor signing up for service at this time is guaranteed sufficient subjects to carry him for at least a year. With the special fashion pictures, intimate views of famous stage stars, together with the series of comedies being produced weekly by the Kinemacolor Company, wide diversity of program can be offered.

Another redical departure for the Kinemacolor Company is the selling of machines. By a simple mechanical contrivance, the Kinemacolor machine can be transformed into a black and white machine, and the black and white pictures now projected by this machine are perfect in every way. The price of the machine has been set at a very low figure, so that exhibitors using only one machine in their theaters are able to secure this combination of Kinemacolor and black and white projection.

The principal reason for this sale of Kinemacolor machines is that the company may be able to meet the demand for the booking of the special features that will be released from time to time, such as the Weber & Fields productions, Panama Canal, Maeterlinck's "Bluebird," and others of similar nature.

Under the former system it was necessary to transport the heavy Kinemacolor projecting outfit from town to town, whereas by the placing of a large number of machines this transportation expense and time of setting up machines will be eliminated.

"CHECKERS" ANOTHER ALL STAR FEATURE.

"Checkers," with Thomas W. Ross in the title role, is definitely announced as the next release of the All Star Feature Corporation, whose first release, "Arizona," was put on the market only about three weeks ago.

As a novel by Henry M. Blossom, Jr., "Checkers" first came into popularity some ten years ago. From the play a scenario has been prepared by Lawrence McGill and Eustace Hale Ball and, working from this scenario, the new production for the camera has been staged under the personal supervision of Augustus Thomas, director-general of productions for the All Star Feature Corporation. The photoplay will be in six parts and will contain more than two hundred scenes. The race track scenes were staged at Havre-de-Grace and at Laurel, Md., during the race meetings there and in the great betting ring scene there were employed hundreds of actors. The cast of principals was selected personally by Mr. Thomas and contains many well known Broadway names. Playing "Pert Barlow," opposite to Mr. Ross is Katherine LaSalle; and William A. Williams will be seen as "Push Miller," the race horse tout.

STATE RIGHT CONTRACTS.

The Exclusive Features, Inc., of which Harry Samwick is secretary and treasurer, has contracted for the entire Itala feature output for Greater New York City and Northern New Jersey, beginning with "The Gypsy's Kiss." The Exclusive Features now, also, has standing orders on all Eclectic, Lewis Pennant and Eclair features for the same territory, giving the Exclusive Features two new subjects weekly.

"PRINCESS," A NEW FILM.

The Mutual program will soon release the Princess photoplays made at New Rochelle. Titles of initial releases are "Looking for Trouble," "Lobster Salad and Milk," and "The Campaign Manageress," farces, as the names would indicate. In these Muriel Ostriche, a very attractive and petite actress, and Marie Eline, popularly known as the "Thanhouser Kid," are the featured leads. This new company has the distinction of having a director who is also the camera man. Carl Gregory fills this combined position.

Among the sales of Itala features during the week have been that of "Unmasked," to the Wolverine Feature Film Co., of Detroit, for the Michigan territory; Exclusive Features of Cleveland, for Ohio; European Feature Film Co. of New York, for Greater New York and Northern New Jersey.

Simplex Projectors.

A General test gave Mutual satisfaction and Universal popularity.

Over 4,000,000 ft. of film per week is projected by Simplex machines at the main offices and studios of the General, Mutual and Universal Film companies.

Think of it, 4 million ft. or 757½ miles.

There are 16 pictures to every foot of film, therefore, in 4,000,000 ft. the intermittent movement must operate 64,000,000 times. One fourth of a revolution of the intermittent sprocket moves the film the length of one picture; therefore, one complete revolution would draw down four pictures and to move the above amount of film, would require 16,000,000 complete revolutions.

A sprocket 1.35" in diameter, traveling at the same rate of speed on a surface, would cover in one week's time 1070.7 miles or equal to a distance as great as from New York to Chicago.

This should convince the most skeptical that Simplex machines are built for hard service. They are capable of a quality of projection heretofore unknown to the moving picture world and have successfully competed with over forty types of different projectors at home and abroad.

CORRESPONDENCE

BUFFALO.

MOVING pictures and vaudeville will be featured in a theater to be built in Welland, Ont., not far from Buffalo, by the Griffin Amusement Co.

Manager A. R. Sherry, of the New Lyric Theater, recently featured "Robespierre" in moving pictures. As an extra vaudeville attraction, he had Five Old Soldier Boys, musicians and dancers. Many Buffalo G. A. R. members took advantage of an invitation to attend, free of charge, the performances of the talented veterans.

Scenes of the Perry centennial celebration in Buffalo were offered in moving pictures recently by Manager Harold Edel, of the Strand Theater, here.

George W. Ryder, manager of the Family Theater, recently had as his guests a tribe of real Indians, who witnessed a performance of "Hiawatha" in moving pictures, at that house. Other late features carried by Mr. Ryder were, "The Last Days of Pompeii" and "Brennan of the Moor."

After a successful season, General Manager Henry S. Fisher closed Crystal Beach, located near here, on September 13th. A moving picture theater is among the many attactions at the resort.

The Buffalo Feature Film Corporation has been organized. Its capital stock is $25,000 and the directors are George H. Verbeck, William H. Stevens and John R. Stevens.

Harold Edel, manager of the Strand Moving Picture Theater, recently used an original newspaper advertisement to boom "Victory," shown in moving pictures at his house. A well drawn picture showing a fight between a battleship and an aeroplane was used in his advertisement, which contained the information that the scenes in "Victory" were photographed by permission of the U. S. Government. The shows were well patronized.

A. R. Sherry, manager of the New Lyric Theater which features vaudeville and moving pictures, was selected with fifty others by the Buffalo Evening News to witness the world's baseball series between the New York Giants and the Philadelphia Athletics. The News arranged to bear the expenses of the trip in connection with a popularity contest conducted for several months by that paper.

Manager Ryder, of the Family Moving Picture Theater, has been featuring Daniel Frohman's production with Mrs. Fiske in "Tess of the D'Urbervilles." Other attractions here included "A Living Corpse," "Jephtha's Daughter," and "The Power of a Hypnotist."

Manager Marcus, of the Academy Theater, an experienced showman, has been using amateur try-outs and song reviews to advantage in connection with his vaudeville and moving picture shows.

The Buffalo Courier has been printing coupons advertising the Happy Hour Moving Picture Theater managed by Harry Marsy. Holders of the coupons are admitted free to the forenoon shows during the week, except on holidays. Minors are not admitted on the coupons. The Hippodrome Theater is using similar coupons in the same newspaper.

The formal opening of the Allendale moving picture theater, at Allen street and Elmwood avenue, Buffalo, took place recently. This is the newest photoplay house in this city and is a handsome structure of brick and stone. It is commodious, well ventilated, fireproof and modern in every way. L. Michaels, a prominent merchant who has been meeting with success in Buffalo theatrical enterprises, is proprietor. H. S. Hexmann who has had plenty of experience in the moving picture business, is manager. High class pictures are the attractions. Further details of the house will be given later.

"Roberson's travelogues," in moving pictures, are being featured at the Broadway Auditorium. Excellent lectures accompany the scenes, which show interesting places in Europe. The Buffalo "Evening News" has been printing half-page advertisements of the shows and coupons admitting holders at reduced rates to the performances. On account of the wide circulation of that paper, the attendance has been very heavy. There is music by the 65th Regiment band.

WARNER'S FEATURES, INC., have moved from 45 Erie street to 23 West Swan street, Buffalo. The office is in charge of D. J. Chatkin, former manager of the Universal offices at Toledo. Mr. Chatkin has been with the Universal Company eight years, and was at one time connected with the Chicago office of that concern. "The first programme of the Warner's Features, Inc., was released recently," said Mr. Chatkin, "and since that time our trade has been exceedingly fine. We have secured enough contracts with the finest houses in this territory to assure us of a wonderful success."

The Allendale Theater, Allen street, near Elmwood, is using Warner's Features programme exclusively. These pictures were featured recently by that house: "Theodora," "Jephtha's Daughter" and "The Living Corpse." Manager Ryder, of the Family Theater, has also contracted for the Warner Service.

A. R. Sherry, prominently connected with the Mark-Brock Theatrical Enterprises for four years, has resigned as manager of the New Lyric Theater, which features vaudeville and moving pictures. Mr. Sherry is one of the most enterprising young men in the business and his many friends will be much interested in his plans, which he will announce later.

It is rumored that the Mark-Brock Theatrical Enterprises, of Buffalo, is to enter into a lease of the George E. More property, fronting on Main street, between North and South Division, and extending through to Washington street, in this city. It is stated that the property is to be used for the erection of the largest and the costliest moving picture theater in Buffalo. The property has a frontage of 25 feet in Main street and spreads out to a 60-foot frontage in Washington street.

According to a report issued by the Buffalo bureau of building for the past fiscal year, fourteen motion picture theaters, costing $384,500, were built in this city during that period.

D. J. Savage has become manager of the Buffalo branch of the Mutual Film Co., at 272 Washington street. He was formerly with the General Film Co., and has been in the moving picture business since the opening of the industry here. He is well known in the trade and is well equipped for his new position.

An explosion of natural gas in front of the building, recently damaged the Abbott Moving Picture Theater, Buffalo. The house was just finished by M. S. Jacobson, manager and owner. A gas line running into the building was tapped. The belief is that the pipe connections were not strong enough to hold the pressure and the explosion followed. The loss amounted to $2,000.

About 300 moving picture men of this city and Western New York, attended the recent smoker of the Buffalo Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association in the rooms above the Happy Hour Theater, Oct. 8. Speeches were made by Mayor Fuhrmann, his secretary, John Sayles and others. The mayor said he admired the men behind the moving picture business because they were handling a legitimate proposition. John Sayles paid tribute to the photoplays as educators of the best kind. He made a plea that the exhibitors offer to the Buffalo public the best films they could secure. The committee in charge of the programme was composed of Harry Marsey, Bernhardt Vohwinkel, Richard Getelle, Joseph Velte and John F. Miller.

BILLY BISON.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE Empire Theater, operated by Samuel Greenberg, on H Street, between Ninth and Tenth Streets, is one of the latest additions in the Northeast section. The building, a one-story structure, is fireproof throughout; the entrance is very attractive, with a blue and white mosaic floor and a gold pergola ticket office, which in winter is heated by steam. On the left of this is a baby carriage garage, a novelty in this city, which will easily accommodate 25 carriages at the one time. For the convenience of patrons there are also two lavatories conveniently located. The seating capacity of the house is 500. The flooring is of cement and the ceiling is of art metal, set with a number of electric lights of the direct-indirect type. The bowl-shaped shades are semi-opaque, throwing the light against the white ceiling, from which it is then reflected. Side lamps in imitation onyx shades throwing a quiet light are used during the performance. The system of ventilation is exceptionally good, changing the atmosphere every 6½ minutes, and is patented after that in use at one of the city's leading theaters. For winter service, the building is equipped with a large steam heating plant. The operative's stand is large and comfortable, with space for three machines and an electric winder. Two machines are kept in operation. Music is furnished during the afternoons and evenings of the week by a piano and violin, while on Sundays this is increased to an orchestra of six pieces.

L. S. Williams, who for twenty-three years acted as photographic expert for the United States Department of Agriculture, but who recently resigned to accept a position as head of the educational department of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, will shortly place on exhibition the first of a series of educational pictures to be taken in and about Washington. This shows the search for honey made by the bee. The second of the series will be devoted to chicken farming, a third to the milk industry, showing how the animals are taken care of, the sanitary method of building barns and creameries and the manner in which the cow is separated from its store of lacteal fluid; the rice industry and the work of the various departments in this city, such as the Bureau of Fisheries, of Standards, Lighthouses, etc., are also to be prepared in film form.

The Exchange League of Washington held a Get-together dinner at the Continental Hotel on October 16. The affair was quite an elaborate one; many out-of-town guests were present. William P. Herbst is president of the local organization.

The Crandall Amusement Company has been formed to promote a moving picture theater now in the process of construction at Ninth and E Streets, N. W. H. M. Crandall is president, Samuel Steinberger, vice-president, and H. A. Johnston, secretary-treasurer of the company, with offices in the Evans Building. The public is being invited to subscribe to the stock.

A $30,000 building is to be erected on Fourteenth Street, N. W., between Irving Street and Columbia Road, for the Savoy Theater Company, which now operates the Lyric on Fourteenth Street. The house will have a seating capacity of 810 and will occupy a lot 65 by 138 feet.

Moving pictures and colored views showing the streets and stores of Washington played a prominent part in the advertising of this city prior to the holding of Fall Trade Week. Will H. Thomas, lecturer, carried these pictures through the surrounding country and impressed upon the people the desirability of Washington as a shopping center. During the week in question box office receipts at the various local houses were materially increased.

Plans are now being prepared for a moving picture house to be located on North Capitol Street, between O and P Streets, which will have a frontage of fifty feet and a depth of one hundred feet, with a seating accommodation for five hundred persons. All of the newest features in theater construction are to be embodied in the building. It will be conducted by the Home Amusement Company, of Washington, and will cost approximately $15,000.

A permit has been granted Theodore Sloat, builder, to erect a moving picture theater at 301 Fourth Street, Northeast. The estimated cost of the building is $6,000.

IN THE NORTHWEST

THE American Fork Motion Picture Company, of Salt Lake City, Utah, has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $12,000. F. M. Houstan is president, L. W. Nielson, vice-president, Lydia Houstan secretary, and Nina Nielsen, treasurer.

Walter Lubkin, of Boise, Idaho, filmed the horse show at Montpelier, Idaho, and the pictures will be used to exploit the State at the Panama exposition.

George Hardin is now owner of the Bijou Theater at Hope, N. D.

The Opera House, at Litchfield, Minn., has been leased by the management of the Unique Theater in that city.

A corporation has been formed at Olympia, Wash., with $1,200,000 capital, to carry the coupon or trading stamp idea into the moving picture theaters. Coupons will be redeemable in merchandise free or at reduced rates, and will be taken up at central stores. They will be distributed with tickets sold at the photoplay houses. Spokane men interested in the corporation are: H. E. Owen, Harry L. Rodgers and Harry L. Cohn.

F. E. Lochner and C. E. Woodward are now managing the Crystal Theater at Fairmount, Minn.

H. H. Douglas has purchased the Bijou Theater at Mahnomen, Minn.

Carl Nelson has leased the opera house at Cando, N. D.

The Gem Theater, at Billings, Mont., has been sold to Ketchum & Ryburn.

The Kalem picture, "From the Manger to the Cross," will be shown for four months by the Deseret Sunday School Union, of Salt Lake City, Utah, for the benefit of Sunday school children. Matinees will be given at 4 o'clock daily at the Salt Lake Theater, for the benefit of the school children.

IN THE MIDDLE WEST.

Warner's Features, Inc., have moved from 45 Erie street to 23 West Swan street, Buf played in the Middle West. The newspapers have accorded this subject better treatment than any other film recently put out, although Kalem's "From the Manger to the Cross" was heralded as a photoplay achievement by the secular press.

W. L. Fursman will be manager for the Majestic Theater at Madison, Wis., which will be run as a picture show following its taking over by Fleckles & Leserman. John Kester and C. E. Meier will build a photoplay house on Atwood avenue, in Madison.

A creditable announcement of the intention to run the highest class of pictures was made in Omaha, Neb., when the houses there decided to raise their prices. The Nicholas will secure an admission of fifteen cents and the Elite Nos. 1 and 2, ten cents each.

What is termed "the crookedest railroad in the world," the Rapid City, Black Hills & Western, between Rapid City and Mystic, S. D., recently was filmed by Charles Martin, of Omaha, Neb., the reels to be used for advertising purposes. The road, which is thirty-four miles long, has 110 bridges and innumerable curves.

LOUISVILLE.

MANAGER D. LEVINSON, of the Novelty Theater, handled a record-breaking attendance on October 5 when Imp's "Bleeding Hearts, or Jewish Freedom Under King Casimir of Poland" was the feature of his program. He had handbills distributed throughout the sections of the city where Jewish residents are thickest, and they responded to the appeal of this film in hundreds.

A Louisville motion-picture photographer narrowly escaped causing somebody a serious injury when he let his camera get away from him on the closing day of the races at Douglas Park, October 4, and fall from the top of the stand to the floor. The camera was smashed to bits, but the film magazine remained intact. Pictures had been taken of one race, but the loss of the camera rendered it impossible to take the two-mile Louisville Cup Race, which was the event for which the photographer had gone out to the track and taken up his elevated position on top of the stand.

R. H. Hunter, of Louisville, went to Madisonville, Ky., last week to take charge of the Garrick Theater, the newest acquisition of the Switow Amusement Company in that section. Manager C. H. Bleich bade his friends in the town farewell at a special performance, to which he invited them to come for that purpose. He left immediately after the arrival of Mr. Hunter to take up his duties as secretary of the Business Men's Association of Hopkinsville, Ky.

W. Drollinger, formerly of Evansville, Ind., where he was manager of the office of the Central Film Service Company, is now established at Indianapolis, Ind., where he will handle the state rights of "Satan" films for Indiana, Kentucky and Tennessee. Mr. Drollinger was in Louisville recently, booking future "Satan" productions with local exhibitors.

Charles Berger, owner of the two New Grand Theaters, at Corydon, Ind., and Louisville, Ky., respectively, recently lifted his Corydon house into metropolitan ranks by contracting for Universal service.

H. D. Ticknor, of the Standard Film Company, of Louisville, said recently that business with his organization is extremely good, the call for Bison and Frontier features being particularly strong from exhibitors out in the State.

George Harris, Jr., manager of the Capital Theater, of Frankfort, Ky., was among the out-of-town exhibitors who were in Louisville attending the festivities held in connection with the Perry Centennial. Mr. Harris is at present much interested in a plan which he is perfecting to start a chain of six or seven theaters in Kentucky towns which are now without this popular form of amusement. With this in mind, he made several short trips out of Louisville during his visit, investigating conditions.

A large number of Ashland, Ky., people, friends of Manager Dick Martin, of Ashland, who is handling the new Placade Theater, in Huntington, W. Va., went over to the West Virginia city on the evening of September 30 to attend the opening of the Placade. The theater is one of the prettiest in that section of the country, and with an exceptionally strong bill, the opening performance was greeted with packed houses.

Contracts have been let at Owensboro, Ky., for an addition to the Empress Theater, owned and operated by George A. Bleich, which will make it second only to the Majestic, of Louisville, among motion-picture theaters in Kentucky. The seating capacity will be brought up to nearly 900 by the addition. No interruption to performances will result.

A growing industrial use of the motion picture was recently illustrated at Frankfort, Ky., when T. H. Ennis, a special representative of the National Power Company, of Birmingham, Ala., staged an exhibition showing the working of a water motor which the company will shortly put on the market. The exhibition was for the benefit of a number of Frankfort men who are stockholders in the concern, which is promoting the new motor. The pictures were taken at Louisville on the Falls of the Ohio, which are to be utilized by the motor in the generation of power. It has been declared to be economically impracticable to derive power from the falls, but the company believes that its motor will solve the problem successfully, and incidentally the moving pictures seemed to prove it.

R. E. Lee, of Monticello, Ky., is planning to open a five-cent motion-picture show in that town as soon as he can properly remodel a building which he has leased for that purpose. Work will be rushed and the new house will be opened shortly.

Thomas L. Ewan, a real estate man of Maysville, Ky., and others, are planning to organize a stock company to operate the Pastime Theater, in that city, which was recently closed. The house will be thoroughly overhauled and re-decorated. William Dern will probably be manager.

The Crescent Amusement Company, of Nashville, Tenn., which owns the Elite and Columbia Theaters in Bowling Green, Ky., will on January 1 begin the erection of a third house in that city, according to J. P. Masters, manager of the company's two houses there. The company has acquired a long lease on a desirable site located on the public square, upon which it will erect one of the handsomest photoplay houses in that section. The house will have a seating capacity of 500. An admission of only five cents will be charged. President Tony Sudekum, of the company, has already made arrangements in Chicago for an excellent program for the new house.

Edward T. Gilligan, manager of Cook's Park, a popular resort at Evansville, Ind., has been appointed manager of the Nelson Theater, at Logansport, Ind., and will leave shortly to take charge.

It is reported in Cincinnati that a motion picture theater is to be built at the northwest corner of Clark and Linn Streets, with a seating capacity of 1,500. Options on the ground necessary have been acquired, and it is said that a company with a capital stock of $150,000, most of which has been subscribed, is behind the venture. A question about the title to part of the property may delay the deal for a time. The site said to be involved is 123 feet on Linn Street, with a depth of 90 feet to an alley.

It is announced that the New National Theater, at Fifth and Walnut Streets, will be opened to theatergoers in Louisville about November 1, the work having been delayed considerably by slow deliveries of steel work. It was originally hoped to have the new playhouse open by September 15. Lee Goldberg, who has been connected with Louisville theaters in various capacities for several years, has been appointed manager of the house. The National will be in the Jones, Linck & Schaefer Vaudeville circuit, and will show only high-class vaudeville and hippodrome acts, with a select moving-picture program twice a day. The theater is easily the handsomest in the city, and seats 3,000 persons.

The Switow Amusement Company, of Louisville, expects to open its $35,000 photoplay house in New Albany, Ind., the New Grand, about October 12. The theater is to be absolutely fireproof. It will seat 700 persons on the main floor and 300 more in the balcony. The program will consist of pictures and vaudeville, and prices will be ten and twenty cents. A five-piece orchestra will be used. The New Grand will make the twelfth house in the Switow string in actual operation.

It is estimated that between 8,000 and 10,000 people saw the magnificent Imp production of "Ivanhoe" at the Novelty Theater, in Louisville, during the two days this great feature ran there. King Baggot, who was in Louisville during the week following the exhibition of this film at the Novelty, expressed himself as immensely pleased with the manner in which the production has taken not only in Louisville, but all over the country.

The city council of Frankfort, Ky., recently passed a resolution directing the Fire Committee of that body to inspect all moving picture shows in operation and under construction with particular reference to the number of exits and other matters for the protection of the public in case of fire. The committee was also directed to inform the owner of a new theater about to be built of the conditions under which he would be allowed to operate.

T. A. Nolan, of Cincinnati, Ohio, who has been operating the Pastime Theater, at Maysville, Ky., recently became connected with a film service concern in New York which forbids its representatives to engage in the operation of a theater, and the Pastime is therefore for sale. He has already disposed of his theater in Cincinnati, and Thomas L. Ewan & Company, of Cincinnati, have the Pastime in their hands for sale.

Hurley Brothers, proprietors of the Dreamland Theater, at Providence, Ky., have let the contract for a brick building, 90 by 26 feet, to be completely equipped for the operation of a new picture show, which will be conducted by them in addition to the Dreamland. The firm is already conducting shows in Princeton, Ky., and Mt. Vernon, Ind., as well as in Providence. The new house will have a seating capacity of 400 people.

Miss Marguerite Lawson, of Hopkinsville, Ky., has accepted the position of pianist at the Lillian Theater, Clarksville, Tenn., and is now handling the musical end of the program in that house, which is one of the finest in that section of Tennessee. Miss Lawson has a repertoire of over 600 selections, and is well qualified to handle the work.

C. C. Moore, of Ashland, Ky., is said to be contemplating the erection of a new building on his property at Twenty-ninth Street and Winchester Avenue, in that city, to be operated as a moving-picture show.

J. E. Fawcett, of Madisonville and Earlington, Ky., has made arrangements to open a photoplay house at Crofton, Ky. The performances will be given in the Odd Fellows' building, on two nights out of the week, using the Universal three-reel program.

Hugh Russell, of Ashland, Ky., was in Ironton, Ohio, recently, in consultation with his associates there relative to the project of building a new and modern theater on the present site of the Empire. It is also reported that the Princess Rink building, in Ironton, may be remodeled for use as a motion-picture theater.

The Exhibitors' Feature Film Company, of Toledo, Ohio, was recently organized for the purpose of conducting a film exchange business. The capital stock is fixed at $25,000, and the organizers are Sigmund Sanger, Aaron E. Cohn, E. C. Froelich, Vada C. Southard and Trude Wooster.

Jack Thomas, a moving-picture man, recently purchased an old Methodist church building in Marion, Ky., at a cost of $1,200 and proposes to remodel it for use as a photoplay house.

The Famous Players' Film Service was incorporated recently in Chattanooga, Tenn., with a capital stock of $25,000, for the purpose of handling the productions of the Famous Players Company and others. Those interested are: Elmer D. Rule, Lawrence H. Smith, John A. Rule and others.

The Star Amusement Company has been organized in Nashville, Tenn., and will operate several picture shows in that city and elsewhere, according to the plans of its promoters. The capital stock is fixed at $1,000. The incorporators were E. F. Lusky, Dora Lusky, M. Starr, J. Starr and Gus Kornman.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

MAJOR HARRY T. LOPER, proprietor of the Lyric, was selected by Col. Richings J. Shand, assistant adjutant general of the Illinois National Guard and grand marshal of the pageantry in this city during the State Fair week, to act as one of his aides.

A determined movement has been on foot among local proprietors to secure a new scale of admission prices. It has not been decided upon whether five cents will be asked for two reels or ten for three. If some of the houses take the two for five proposition they will want to run pictures that have not been shown here and fresher stuff. This means that the Vaudette and Lyric will have to divide the output of the licensed companies with them.

The Central Feature Company, of this city, has been booking its new feature, "Conscience," in a number of Illinois houses. Art Simons, who was out with "The Last Days of Pompeii" for this company, has resigned to take the management of the Rex, the theater at Petersburg which has been purchased by W. W. Watts, of the Vaudette Amusement Company, of Springfield.

The Illinois State Board of Charities gave the moving picture a prominent place on the program for the eighteenth annual Conference of Charities and Correction, at Rockford, October 11-14. For the Sunday evening program Dr. George A. Zeller, superintendent of the Peoria Hospital, showed films of his unique institution where he has often taken five hundred unguarded patients to a circus. Another interesting show was upon the subject of blindness and the preservation of vision. This was exhibited at one of the Rockford houses.

P. Leslie Bradbury was brought back from Arizona upon a warrant sworn out by Thomas Hudson, a harness maker of Springfield, who charges that Bradbury defrauded him of $300 by selling him a moving-picture show in Quincy, Ill., that did not exist. Hudson declares that Bradbury represented himself as a representative of an Arizona corporation which operates photoplay houses throughout the country. Hudson paid over the $300 for the Quincy house, but when he went to that city could not find it. Bradbury was held under $1,000 bond.

EUGENE JOHNSON and J. G. Showers are erecting a new building at Onalaska for their Crystal Theater. They have been exhibiting at Woodman Hall every Monday evening.

Ray O. Pickrell, of Bridgeport, Ill., has purchased the Ripon Theater at Ripon.

The Liberty Theater, at Milwaukee, and Andrew C. Brown, principal of the Twenty-seventh street school in that city, recently co-operated in an exhibition of Alaska-Siberian pictures, in an effort to learn the attitude of parents toward educational films. Principal Brown is an enthusiastic advocate of the use of pictures, but believes that until schools can afford to add a machine and service to the curriculum, officials should co-operate with houses which are showing the best class of subject.

The White House Theater, 429 Wisconsin street, Racine, has been leased to C. M. Hund, of Galesburg, Ill.

Morris Ruwin's moving picture airdome at Fifth and Lincoln avenues, Milwaukee, was closed by the city on the ground that it violated the building ordinances.

Dr. Tanner will open a moving picture show at Bloomington.

Dr. J. M. Hagan has sold the Hagan Opera House, at New Richmond, to Frank Hughes and Barney Greeley.

Frederick Jacobi and Lynn Fletcher have leased the Henry Scheele Building, at Sheboygan Falls, and will open a photoplay house.

An ordinance requiring the appointment of a censorship committee of three inspectors and a secretary has been prepared by the judiciary committee of the common council at Milwaukee. This board would be maintained by charging a fee of fifty cents for each picture inspected.

G. W. Thompson and E. J. Stewart will open a moving picture house in St. Croix Falls.

THE Star Theater, at Evanston, has lengthened its business day. The eprogram begins at 10 A. M. and continues until 5 P. M. when the pictures are changed and run until 10:30 P. M.

William Bruce Leffingwell, travelogue man, showed 20,000 feet of moving pictures at the "Made in Quincy" exposition in that city. One day was set aside for the public school children to see these films and hear his travel talks.

Manager Quinn, of the Majestic, at Rock Island, showed the complete set of the "What Happened to Mary" series in six days, giving two of the stories at a show.

John Vaughn, of Vermont, Ill., has purchased a moving picture outfit and opened a theater at Browning.

Bodkin & Keane have secured a site and will open a theater at Wilmette, which will seat 1,000 persons.

Col. Vernon C. Seaver expects to open his new Hippodrome in Peoria early in October.

Business men at Farmington have echoed the cry that the moving pictures given free each midweek are a great attraction for the people of the surrounding country.

Wyoming now has but one picture show, the Lyceum, conducted by Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Higbee. The Princess Theater has been closed and the equipment taken to Princeville, where Edward Parker, of Wyoming, will operate a show.

The Gem Theater at Clinton, which has been closed the latter part of the summer, has been reopened by J. I. Thorpe. The place has been altered, a part of the large lobby being converted into seating room and a sloping floor installed. Five hundred seats are now accessible to the photoplay patrons of this place.

The Grand motion picture house, at Moline, which was closed August 4, has been reopened.

J. B. Watson will erect a new theater at La Grange.

The Unity Club of the Church of the Christian Union, at Rockford, is contemplating the use of educational films, although nothing definite has been done in the matter. It is likely that the church will install its own machine if the plan is carried out.

The Palm Theater, at Rockford, has been contemplating installing a pipe organ.

The Universal Portland Cement Company of Chicago, by using industrial moving pictures, has executed a coup that should bring that firm much business. A new law in Illinois allows the state to furnish each county with a good sum of money to be used in the construction of hard roads, if the county donates a similar sum. The cement company sends two men with machines to the meetings when this matter is considered by the county boards, and shows what kind of highways can be constructed from concrete.

The Warrington Theater, at Oak Park, has gone from stock to vaudeville. The latter policy includes the use of the kinemacolor pictures.

Department stores in the larger Illinois cities are using motion pictures in connection with living models at their annual fall fashion shows.

The Playhouse at Oak Park, announced that with the last of September it would inaugurate daily matinees, making five performances daily.

OPERATORS at the Iris, the Best and the Aurora in Topeka, Kan., recently struck. It is said that they demanded a seven-hour day in accordance with the clause in the new contract of the International Association of Theater and Stage Employees, with which the moving picture operators are affiliated. The other four photoplay houses in the city agreed to the seven-hour clause, but in three they walked out. The operator at the Cozy was also ordered out, it is said, but he turned in his union card and stayed on the job. J. C. Elliott, manager of the Iris, is quoted as saying that the operators were only called upon to work the full eight hours, but the managers refused to give up their rights to hold for eight hours on days when the patronage justified, and not have to pay overtime for the last hour. M. D. Jones, vice-president of the local union issued the following statement: "It is not true that the operators worked last year under an eight-hour contract. The contractors called for a seven-hour working day at $18 a week, with 50 cents an hour overtime. When the time came to renew the contracts the managers of four houses refused to sign up the same contracts as last year, but demanded that the men agree to work eight hours a day for the same wages paid them the last year for a seven-hour day. When they refused to sign up on any other terms there was nothing for the operators to do but to walk out. They had the backing of the Industrial Council of Topeka in so doing."

The Southern Film Service, of Houston, Tex., has been incorporated with a capital stock of $20,000. The incorporators are J. G' Willington, F. M. Sager and W. N. Lowry.

F. E. Rundell, who has leased the opera house at Oxford, Kan., will use the place for a moving picture show.

A. A. Brach took a reel of pictures at Port [illegible] Tex.

A [illegible]ng picture show marked the opening of schools at the College of Industrial Arts at Denton, Tex. It was announced this was for the purpose of overcoming any feelings of homesickness which the new boys might feel.

Great Bend, Kan., picture shows are in line for a crusade against the Sunday performances, it is reported.

The Board of Theatrical Censors in Houston, Tex., has no power to prevent objectionable moving pictures being shown, according to a letter written by Henry Stude, a member of the board, to Mrs. Charles Bonn, of the Harris County Humane Society. She was informed that the only remedy was to make complaint to the mayor in the city where the pictures were to be shown.

C. W. Newton has moved his moving picture show to the new Crockett Building on Maine Street, in Kirbyville, Tex.

The Daily Opic managers, Duncan and Browne, of the Photoplay Theater at Las Vegas, New Mex., recently gave a free Saturday afternoon matinee to children under 14 years of age who presented themselves with clean hands and faces.

O. W. Holly, manager of Dreamland Theater, recently leased the Dean Building on North Getty Street, at Uvalde, Tex., and remodeled it for his picture show.

Mistaken ideas of conditions at the correctional institutions of Kansas will be corrected by moving pictures. Films have been taken at the Industrial School for Girls at Beloit and another set will be made of the boys at the Industrial School near North Topeka. It is probable that later the penitentiary at Lansing and the reformatory at Hutchinson will be included. Charles M. Harger, a member of the Board of Corrections, believes that the films will prove popular and will enlighten the people as to the educational phases that have been adopted at the state institutions.

Saul S. Harris, owner of the Royal and Gem theaters at Little Rock, Ark., who recently took over the Savoy, has announced that for ten days each month he will show pictures produced by the Belasco-Frohman Company.

EXCHANGE managers in Detroit made a strenuous protest to a censorship which would compel them to take their films to the police station for inspection. A. J. Gillingham, manager for the General Film Company, suggested that a projecting room be fitted up at the Universal headquarters. The managers, he said, would furnish the room and the operator, if the commission would allow the censoring to be done at the offices of any of the distributing agencies. Police Commissioner Gillespie, who is responsible for the agitation, did not take kindly to this plan, because he wanted the films where he could keep his eyes upon them. The managers also objected that the inspection fee of seventy-five cents a film was too high. Attention was called to the work of the National Board, and that it was the State right and special features that was causing all the trouble. The suggestion of the police commissioner that by having the films inspected at some exchange, it would be possible for managers to show "old films" was met. It proposed that letters be issued to each theater which was showing properly censored films and that licenses be revoked in case any pictures not passed were shown. Pictures dealing with the life of Evelyn Nesbitt Thaw were barred in Detroit, but Police Commissioner Gillespie held that films of Harry Thaw's escape from Mattewan were all right, as the public was greatly interested in the episode.

The defense by city officials in Grand Rapids, of moving picture theater men who, it is declared, are asked to make unreasonable changes to comply with arbitrary rulings of State inspectors, has been continued. The buildings are said to conform to the specifications of the National Board of Underwriters, and the municipal authorities declare their demands for safety, which have been fulfilled, are sufficient. An order to the Board of Education to install fireproof booths, may cause trouble, as Assistant City Attorney Hull contends the schools are part of the educational system, and not amusement enterprises. The pictures have been used largely in social center work and the added expense may retard the progress of this worthy movement. A plan to show pictures at a State convention was checked by the State inspectors because the convention hall was not on the ground floor and the seats were not fixed. A recent order was issued to close Park Congregational Church, Powers' Theater, Majestic Theater, The Evening Press, and all the school shows except the Central High School.

Jafet Rytkonan and August Allen are remodeling the Star Theater, at Negaunee.

W. A. Jamison, of Ontonagon, is remodeling a building at that place, which will be used for a picture show.

D. E. Rice will be in charge of the Bijou Theater, at Marquette, which has been leased by the Rice Amusement Company, of Hancock.

The Last Word in Isolated Plants

THE "SHEFFIELD LIGHT PLANT" needs no care while running. No engineer necessary. Start the plant for a continuous twenty-four hour run and you need not go near it until ready to shut down.

No Repair Bills

There are no gears, "jewelry or claptrap" on the "SHEFFIELD LIGHT PLANT" to get out of order, and therefore no breakdowns. All the TOOLS NECESSARY for the outfit are two "S" wrenches.

WITH A "SHEFFIELD LIGHT PLANT" you need no rectifier, economizer or any other mechanism. You get a steady, direct current for your arc that has anything beat for projection.

THE "SHEFFIELD LIGHT PLANT" is not a toy mounted on skids, but is a substantial outfit, built for long life and efficiency, and develops thirty per cent. more than its rated power.

THE "SHEFFIELD LIGHT PLANT" IS NOT COSTLY TO INSTALL, and will pay for itself in a year's time.

We can equip your house for a single arc to FOUR HUNDRED LIGHTS, with either gas or gasoline power. Let us show you.

OLD AND NEW TAHITI, or, HOW THE INFANT CHIEF WAS SAVED (Oct. 23).—The thrilling story told by an old native of Tahiti of how, in years gone by, he saved the island's present great chief, Tati Kakao.

Tati was dedicated to the Teva clan by his mother, the queen. Knekud, the old native, then young, spied enemies approaching the island and warned the queen. A rival clan, led by two Swedish beach-combers, armed with muskets, landed and demanded that the infant chief be surrendered or there would be war. The young and faithful native seeing that his tribesmen were weakening to the enemies' demands, to avert a great war, took the infant from his mother and carried him to a place of safety. And then there was a conflict in which the odds were even, until the young native, finding the Swedish sailors in need of water, helps them to a liquid poisoned with the deadly leaves of Kava. The Tevas were victorious and the clan's honor is sustained. Knekud is honored.

AT THE SIGN OF THE LOST ANGEL (Oct. 27).—"The Lost Angel" is the name of a saloon presided over by Eliza, a woman of sterling character, but with dim appreciation of the finer ethics. A new preacher is expected at Noose Gap. His coming is rather startling. Some desperadoes try to hold up a stage coach in which he is traveling. Being driven off, they make straight for "The Lost Angel." The stage driver suspects their destination. He and the minister rush into the saloon just as one of the rascals is embracing Eliza, and they clean out the place. One of them, however, succeeds in landing a knock-out blow on the dominie. Eliza comes to his aid. The stage driver notices this and is jealous. The boys at the Gap are very sore at the young preacher's introduction to them, but he pays little heed to their objections and never hesitates in pointing out to them that they should turn from Darkness unto Light. At one of his meetings, Eliza is very much moved, in fact the light has been coming to her gradually through reading the little Bible which the young parson has given her. The stage driver gets an idea that "The Gospel Dispenser" is his rival. The "roughnecks" do not take kindly to the religious atmosphere about the Gap and one of them, who felt the force of his muscular Christianity at the Lost Angel, decides to put an end to him. With a boon companion, this fellow goes out upon a secluded roadway to fill the preacher with lead and give the undertaker a job. Eliza, who has overheard the plot, determines to frustrate their plans. She arrives just as the disgruntled bad man is taking deadly aim. She steps forward into the road, receiving the shot. The two desperadoes, seeing the effect of their dastardly work, hasten to make good their escape. The preacher rushes to Eliza's assistance, getting a doctor to her as quickly as possible. The stage driver sorrowfully hears of her self-sacrifice, and learns from the doctor that she is fatally hurt. As the three men stand around her bedside, she tells them of her faith in God, passing peacefully away through the Valley of the Shadow into the Light of Eternal Life.

IN THE SHADOW (Oct. 28).—Thousands of persons would die in the present if it were not for the memories of the past. Old Mrs. Merkle has one cherished reminder of bygone days, her wedding gown. It is filled with associations of the most sacred and hallowed character. This heirloom is coveted by a wealthy woman, who recognizes the rarety of its fabric and the richness of its lace, and decides that it would be a most unique and unusual dress for her daughter's approaching wedding. The gentle old soul will not part with it until, to avoid eviction from her modest little home, she is obliged to sacrifice it. Unfortunately, she loses the money realized, and after all is driven from home and compelled to wend her way to the poor house. She is met by her next-door neighbor's children, to whom she has always been kind, and they induce her to go to their home, where she is welcomed by their parents, who treat her as if she were their own. The strain of her recent experiences has undermined the old lady's health and she is taken very sick. During her delirium she cries for the old wedding gown. The two children take their savings and persuade the purchaser of the gown to let them buy it back. While "Granny" is sleeping, they place the cherished garment on the foot of the bed. Awakening from her slumbers she espies it, and fondly grasping it, she presses it to her heart. While the church bells ring out the wedding chimes of the girl who intended to wear the dress, Mrs. Merkle passes into the Great Beyond, clad in the marriage garment, essential to the realms of eternal peace and happiness.

FATHER'S HATBAND (Oct. 29).—Love finds a way, that is very plain, when Sam and Doris make use of their father's new hat to convey their love missives to each other, because Doris' father objects to his clerk's attention to his daughter. Doris Mason and Sam meet whenever they can and her father is not altogether unsuspecting, very evidently, when he hurries into the sitting room. Sam escapes without being seen. The next morning Doris sends a note to Sam by placing it in the sweat-band of papa's hat. Sam is working hard at his desk when his boss arrives at the office, but he does not fail to reach for the hat as soon as Mason places it on the rack and extract Doris' note from the band. Later in the day, Sam deposits his note in the band and upon the boss's arrival at home for lunch, Doris finds the following epistle: "Dearie: Let's elope. Pack up and meet me at the fountain in Riverside tonight." Doris quickly answered it as follows: "Dearest Buddy: The fountain at Riverside will be most convenient for me. We can leave on the 7:30. Love and kisses." This is deposited in Pop's hat and he hurriedly leaves the house. Mr. Mason, feeling the need of a shave, stops in the barber's, and after having his face scraped, takes Henpeck's hat in mistake for his own. When Henpeck gets shaved he hastily picks up Mason's hat and goes home. Mrs. Henpeck takes his hat and the note falls out. She reads it and goes out determined to confront the brazen huzzy. Henpeck dashes after her. In the meantime, Mason discovers his mistake and goes to the barber's to learn who carried off his hat. Henpeck comes in with the same purpose. Explanations follow. Mason guesses where the note came from and together the two men do a marathon for the fountain. Here they find Mrs. Henpeck giving Doris a piece of her mind. Mason pacifies her and Doris confesses. While this is going on, Sam makes his appearance. Mr. Mason advises them to elope as they had planned and sends them rejoicing on their way.

BIANCA (Oct. 30).—In Southern California, Bianca, a young peasant girl, works in an olive vineyard. Beppo works beside her. He helps her whenever he can and they grow very fond of each other. Angelo, the overseer, is attracted by Bianca, and becomes over-demonstrative. Beppo objects. In the scuffle, Angelo falls, wounded, and Beppo flees. He goes to Bianca's hut for refuge. She begs him to escape at once and gives him what little money she has. His pursuers on his track, he hurriedly leaves, forgetting in his haste his bundle of clothes, which Bianca conceals, to avoid being accused of harboring him. Beppo goes to a distant city and there succeeds in making himself a very prosperous vender of fruits. Bianca, being left alone without a protector, is subject to much insult from Angelo, until she too makes up her mind to escape his indignities. In her little shack she wishes she were a boy, and suddenly remembering Beppo's old clothes, she disguises herself in male attire, makes her way, by riding on freight cars, to the city to which Beppo has fled. Without money, among strange people, she is almost starving, and not recognizing Beppo as he stands at one of the crossings with his pushcart, steals some of his fruit. She is caught, arrested and taken to the police court, to which she is followed by Beppo, who wishes to make a complaint against her. The officers oblige her and the others in the courtroom to remove their hats. As she takes her's off, her long, black hair falls down over her shoulders, and immediately recognizes her as his dearly beloved Bianca. He withdraws his charge, and after telling their stories to the justice, who is neither pleased nor interested, the two young lovers leave the station house together to start life anew as man and wife, happy in the anticipation of the fulfillment of their troth.

FATTY'S AFFAIR OF HONOR (Oct. 31).—Brushville is on the map and boasts of a main street and a few other marks of distinction that may some day be the center of a thriving metropolis. Fatty is a local character and he is often seen in the company of Lucile Henry, the village beauty. A classy stranger arrives in town, sees Lucile with Fatty and is struck with her beauty. He writes on an envelope, as if it were addressed to himself, "Lord Fuzzywuz," and purposely drops the envelope. They pick it up and think he must be some foreign nobleman. He strikes up a flirtation with Lucile an dshe drops Fatty and takes up with the flashy and distinguished gentleman. Fatty looks up his old friend, Zeb, for advice, and Zeb tells him that the only way to get even with this fellow is to challenge him to a duel with pistols, because the foreigners will not deign to fight with their fists. "Too common, don't you know." Fatty thinks over the idea, likes it, and as a consequence, the duel is arranged and accepted by both parties. The morning of the duel arrives. Lucile is to give the signal by dropping a handkerchief. In the meantime Zeb has looked up an old friend of his and they decide—not to hurt the feelings of either contestant—that the duel should be fought with blank cartridges, instead of bullets. Fatty and the "nobleman" know nothing of the blanks, thinking the pistols contain real bullets. In the meantime, Zeb and his friend purchase at the country store, two very antique eggs. Then Zeb and his friend, who are to act as seconds to Fatty and the count, go to the duelling grounds and join their principals. Lucile gives the signal by dropping the handkerchief. Fatty and the count pull triggers, Zeb and his friend, simultaneously throw the eggs—the finish may be imagined.

PEGGY'S BURGLAR (Oct. 31).—A very pretty and snappy comedy with a tone of sentiment and a pleasing atmosphere.

THE WARMAKERS (2 parts—special—Nov. 1).—The Russian ambassador receives a cablegram from his government commanding him to secure the American war plans, Russia being allied to the opposing nation. The ambassador gives a dinner to the diplomats to which Johnston, Secretary of the Navy, and Calhoun, Secretary of War, are invited. Through a forged letter, supposed to come from Johnson, Calhoun is requested to bring the army and navy plans to the dinner. The ambassador enlists the aid of three spies, Rosa, a beautiful Russian woman, Toltoy, an exiled scientist, and Beris, a young assistant in the embassy. Toltoy mixes a secret potion which he calls "The Sleeping Death." At the dinner, from which Johnston is forcibly detained, so as to prevent the truth of the forged letter being known, Beris pours "The Sleeping Death" into the wine, and when the guests drink it they are overcome by its stupefying power and fall senseless on the tables. The ambassador takes the papers from Calhoun and copies them. After replacing them he drinks a glass of the drugged wine and is lost in deep sleep.

The guests revive, and when Johnston rushes in Calhoun learns the truth about the letter. He is sure that the plans have been copied when he sees a tell tale ink-spot upon them.

Through the Secret Service Department the ambassador's spies are searched, but to no avail. It is only when they learn that Rosa is sailing for Europe that they are convinced of the whereabouts of the papers. Isabel, Calhoun's wife, knowing Rosa, volunteers to sail on the same ship. She does so and shares her stateroom with Rosa, the spy. She searches through all of her clothing for evidence of her treachery, and has almost given up in despair when a false alarm of danger is raised. The passengers dash for the life-boats and Rosa grabs up a pair of slippers, which seems to be all she is to save. Isabel later cuts open the soles of the slippers and discovers the papers. Rosa pleads pitifully for mercy. Isabel has not the heart to hand her over to the authorities. She burns the papers and sends a wireless to her husband, who is joyous over the good news.

THE MAN OF HIM (Oct. 27).—The picture opens with a corral scene, men branding horses. A stranger enters, inquires for the owner of the ranch, and asks for a job. Johnson, the boss, does not like his looks very much, but being short of men, gives him a job. The stranger sees all the horses in the corral, and decides to steal them that evening. In the meantime, the horse thief takes a liking to the rancher's little daughter and rescues her from the attacks of a flock of geese. That night the horse-thief gets his confederates, knocks the night watchman senseless and takes the horses. The cowboys pursue and kill all the thieves excepting the leader, who, being only wounded, crawls away. Some of the cowboys go in pursuit of him, but fail to find him, and return to the ranch. In the meantime the little girl at the ranch wanders a long way off, gets lost and is caught in the quicksand. Her cries for help are heard by the horse-thief, who goes to her rescue. In doing so he is caught in the sand himself. He holds the child above his head and frantically calls for help. He is sinking rapidly and the cowboys, who are searching for Bessy, arrive just in time to lasso the child and save her as the horse-thief's hands sink out of sight. The closing scene is of the little girl (later) throwing flowers on the quicksand as she kneels in prayer.

MAKING GOOD (Oct. 28).—Pearl Moore gets sore on her sweetheart, Ted Hall, because Sam Bell, Cora's best boy, has come to their relief when a husky beggar becomes insistent. Pearl tells Ted, she hates a coward, and when Ted pretends that he is not a coward, she tells him to thrash Bill, a husky looking specimen, who passes at that moment. Ted decides to make a bluff and follows Bill. Bill discovers that he is being followed, and becomes panic stricken, finally running from Ted. Ted whips him to a fringe and doesn't get a scratch. That does not look natural, so he gets a physician to do a lot of fake bandaging and goes to Pearl. Meantime, Cora has brought Sam around to show him off to the girls. Ted takes all the wind out of Sam's sails and Sam, to get square, offers to thrash Bill. Bill makes a bluff at hitting back and Sam hides behind Cora leaving all the honors to Ted, who certainly looks the part.

GIVING BILL A REST (Oct. 28).—Mrs. Marie Block is at the Seashore, and finding it lonesome, as the young folks are her only companions, sends for her fat and devoted husband to come for a much needed rest. Bill thinks the idea very good, and goes to the shore. Bill meets his first Waterloo in the hack that Marie has at the train to meet him. The best he gets is to run behind, as he cannot get into the hack. He is next shown doing the gallant, pushing a rolling chair on a hot day. Marie thinks she wants a boat ride. Poor Bill is almost down and out, and a spill in the water, is his experience. Marie next insists that he go out riding. Bill at first refuses, but as usual Marie has her way. Bill gets out in the cart, falls over, and is so fat he cannot right himself and calls for help. Guards and other bathers rescue him and bring him ashore. Bill is now totally all in. He thinks of an excuse to get sent back home. He asks a lady on the [illegible] to flirt with him. As he sees his wife coming, he flirts. Marie sees him, rushes in, takes him home by the ear. Bill gets his wish, goes home, fixes an electric fan up to waft the breezes on [illegible] in his back yard, [illegible] his [illegible], and is once more serenely happy as he sighs, "There is no place like home."

THE RATTLESNAKE (Special—2 parts—Oct. 30).—Tony, a young Mexican, sweetheart of Inez, finds Jose making love to her. He orders Jose away, who leaves in anger, and lays in wait to "Get Tony." Tony, unsuspecting, lolls in the vicinity of a great stone which Jose, from a high point, throws down on him, and while unconscious, Jose raises a dagger to strike the unconscious Tony, when an enormous rattlesnake strikes the would-be assassin in the leg, and in fear and horror he drops his knife and runs for a mud hole. Tony comes to, follows his rival, sees him meet his end, a victim of the poison of the rattler. In the interim, an American surveyor, Jack Gordon, passes Inez's home and inquires his way. Inez offers to show him, and on their way to the mine hears Tony laughing hysterically. They come upon him and the victim of the reptile. Inez and the American continue on their journey and Tony goes home to his mother and sister, the snake in his arms. That evening Tony calls upon Inez and is told she will never speak to him again until the snake is dead. He refuses to kill it. The young American arrives in time to console Inez. Years later we find the American engineer at his work. Tony, whose association with the snake has made him anything but human, comes upon the surveyor and is about to shoot him, when he hears his former sweetheart calling her husband. He watches the fond embrace of the man and wife and turns and flees back to his hovel. At night Tony stealthily enters the American's home and places the rattler in the bed of his enemy. Fortunately for Gordon, he wakes in time to follow the shadow through the window. Inez's child wakes, having forgotten to kiss her papa good night. The mother takes her into the room and the child gets in bed with the reptile. Tony, knowing he is being pursued, stops at the window and sees the child in the bed. His love goes out for the innocent babe and he jumps through the window and saves her. After he is confronted, he kills the snake, but receives a poisonous wound. Six months later we find Tony minus the arm that was bitten. Tony's and Inez's families have a happy reunion.

A MOMENTOUS DECISION (Oct. 31).—Jimmy Jackson, the youthful and most enthusiastic member of the gang of swindlers, stings Phillips, a high financier, for a goodly sum. Phillips learns that he has been swindled. Later he meets Jimmy and telling him he is too clever to be wasting his time with crooks, gets him to join his forces. Jimmy gladly does so and resists all efforts of the gang to win him back or make him crooked in his dealings with Phillips. Phillips neglects his wife and a business friend, Gedney, makes most of the marital rift by making love to her in the husband's absence. A big deal comes up and the gang move every possible wheel to break Phillips through it. Certain papers have to be signed by Phillips at three o'clock on a mentioned day. It is this same day and hour that Gedney coaxes Mrs. Phillips to run off with him. The gang send a decoy telegram to Phillips, getting him out of town and he leaves a power of attorney with Jimmy, emphasizing the fact that if the papers are not signed when the man calls at the mentioned hour he will be ruined. Jimmy tells him he will take care of it and reiterates the fact that he is not in with the gang. Phillips believes him and leaves. When the wife leaves to meet Gedney, the maid tries to dissuade her, but to no purpose. Frantic, she hastens to Jimmy and implores his aid. The hour is the same and it is a question in Jimmy's mind which to sacrifice, the woman or the fortune. He decides to sacrifice the latter, hastens to the tryst and in the altercation that follows, knocks Gedney down and gets the wife to return home. He gets back too late to sign the papers and the gang win out ruining Phillips. Phillips returns home that night realizing he has been duped. He learns that Jimmy failed him and accuses the boy at his home of being a traitor and playing into the hands of his gang. Jimmy will not explain why he didn't sign the papers and Phillips in his anger would have killed him if Mrs. Phillips had not entered at that moment and explained all. She is forgiven and a new and better future opens up for all three.

WHEN THE PRISON DOORS OPENED (Nov. 1).—Sue Davis, on her discharge from jail for shoplifting, is taken in hand by a prominent member of a reform society, and given a ticket and money to go South and start life anew. On the same day, Tom Green is also released from prison, and he too determines to travel southward and begin over again. Sue and Tom meet at the depot, form acquaintance on the train and become friends before the trip ends. On their arrival in the southern [illegible] they promise each other to meet again. Tom [illegible] work in a factory. Sue gets a position in a [illegible] store. They continue to see much of each [illegible] finally conclude to get married. One day, about a year after their marriage, Sue meets an old acquaintance on the street. She is frightened and decides not to recognize her. This angers the woman and she follows her home and insists that she shall pay her to keep silent regarding her past. She complies, in terror that her husband will find out that she has not always been an honest woman. Tom, a few days after, meets an old prison mate who also blackmails him. Both Tom and Sue become unhappy, harassed always by the fear that the other will learn of his or her unworthiness. At last, desperate, they decide to tell each other, and mutually confessing, forgive and begin life once more, free from shadow of crime.

GEORGE KLEINE.

RAJAH'S DIAMOND ROSE (2 parts—special—Oct. 28).—The theme centers about a peculiar method of blackmail practised by Count Seroff, an apparently wealthy and influential Parisian. The count owns a magnificent diamond rose, which, he claims, was given him in reward for a service performed by an East Indian Rajah. The count keeps the diamond in an oddly shaped cabinet, which, at the pressing of a spring, easily opens up. Invariably, after heavy gambling losses, the count takes his young acquaintances to his home and manages to leave them alone with the famous diamond. Temptation comes, the spring is pressed, and suddenly a blinding flash reveals a hidden camera. The count, thoroughly scandalized, then offers to sell the negative for a heavy price, that he may give the proceeds to "charity." Around a story of such splendid possibilities, Eclipse has produced a beautiful two-reel subject. A sweetheart of a girl whose brother was blackmailed by the count, promises to marry the young man provided he will steal the count's diamond. This he does, blindly, getting himself into many difficulties, for love's sake.

EDISON.

HIRAM GREEN, DETECTIVE (Oct. 20).—It all happened because Hiram had an adventurous disposition, and because he was in love with Susie Smithers, the daughter of the village storekeeper. When old man Smithers laughed at his suit, Hiram's soul was filled with a wild desire to prove the native mettle which he felt sure was in him. An attractive advertisement in a newspaper, wherein the Eagle Eye Detective Agency agreed to forward a complete detective outfit on receipt of the modest sum of four dollars, decided Hiram. One bit of advice in the textbook sent with the outfit seemed to Hiram peculiarly valuable. It was to the effect that the budding aspirant for detective glory should follow a great detective about and carefully watch the way he worked. A dark, mysterious stranger who had been lurking about the village store, admitted that he himself was a great detective and was at that time on the trail of a notorious ex-convict, "Gink the Eel," for whose apprehension a liberal reward was offered. Hiram, overjoyed, immediately began to dog the stranger's footsteps. One day, the stranger set off on a brisk walk across country, while Hiram, as usual, followed him at a distance. In a clearing of the woods, the stranger met a short, ugly man, and spoke to him hurriedly. Immediately afterwards, the two men turned their coats inside out and tied their handkerchiefs about the lower halves of their faces. Hiram, in the shadow of the trees, instantly followed suit. The stranger and the other man lay quietly beside the road until old man Smithers appeared, driving over to the bank in his buggy to make his monthly deposit. The men jumped out and forced him to descend from the wagon. At this moment an original and interesting idea occurred to Hiram. Stepping gently from the bushes he tapped the two men lightly on the head with a blackjack. Then he drove back with old man Smithers to receive the plaudits of the multitude for his daring capture of "Gink the Eel." He got Susie, too.

REGINALD'S COURTSHIP (Oct. 21).—Reginald Everly was the star boarder at Mrs. McGinn's select lodging house for ladies and gentlemen. Mrs. McGinn herself considered him a very nice young man indeed. Occasionally he would draw a sympathetic boarder aside and confide to him in low, husky tones that he was one of the first families of Virginia, then would borrow five dollars from the sympathetic boarder.

Reginald was very fond of Flossie Benson. Flossie was the daughter of Reginald's employer. Reginald decided that he could not do better than to marry Flossie. Accordingly, he spoke to Mr. Benson about it.

Mr. Benson laughed heartily for several minutes, and then asked Reginald how he could possibly expect to support Flossie. "You couldn't afford to buy her a dinner, let alone marry her," he concluded. Reginald resolved to show the proud parent that he was able to buy Flossie a dinner. After a delicious dinner with Reginald, with a nonchalant assumption of indifference, kept well within the limit of his resources, the time came to pay the check. Reginald felt confidently in his pocket and discovered that he had left his money in the boarding house. Excusing himself gracefully, he rushed back to the boarding house. Servants and boarders had all gone to the beach. The house was deserted, locked and Reginald had no key. Finally, he went to the pawn shop, changed his dress clothes for the worst suit in the store, and rushed back

JAFFA, THE SEAPORT OF JERUSALEM, AND ITS ORANGE INDUSTRY (Oct. 22).—Jaffa, or Joppa, is situated on the Mediterranean coast some thirty-five miles to the northwest of Jerusalem It is the chief seaport of Palestine, and rejoices in the possession of the worst harbor in the world a rocky, shallow basin which is rather a menace than a protection to shipping

To land the thousands of tourists who enter yearly through this port on their way to Jerusalem and the rest of the Holy Land, the steamers are obliged to anchor a couple of miles from shore and transfer their passengers to small boats which thread their way through rocks and surf to the beach Jaffa's chief industry is raising oranges. Great groves of heavily laden trees stretch for miles outside the city. The scenes showing the orange pickers at work are singularly picturesque.

HIS FIRST PERFORMANCE (Oct. 22).—Tommy McGuire, leading man of "Red Barlow, the Terror of the Gulch," is quite sure that he is destined to make a decided hit in his part as Reginald Fortescue, the noble minded cowboy. Accordingly, he invites his parents to the opening performance of the play at the Centretown Opera House. Mr and Mrs. McGuire, overjoyed at the prospect of seeing their son act, come to Centretown on the appointed day, arrayed in apparel whereat the lilies of the fields might well blush. At length, comfortably settled in their chairs, Mr. and Mrs. McGuire await with pleasurable excitement the raising of the curtain. The play of "Red Barlow" is a cruel, hard thing. Red Barlow has a grudge against the poor rancher and leaves a barrel of powder, with fuse lighted, before the door of his cabin. Reginald Fortescue, the cowboy, enters and despite the frenzied appeals of his parents in the orchestra, sits on the barrel and uses the fuse to light his cigarette After he has put it out and gone away, and after two ushers have succeeded in partially restraining the frantic McGuires, the rancher comes out of his house and carries off the barrel of powder His wife follows him from the house with an ostensible child in her arms and for some unaccountable reason, falls fainting to the ground. The villain and his Indian accomplice attempt to kidnap her but are foiled by Reginald. While Reginald kneels with the unconscious woman in his arms, the villain enters from the back, draws a long knife and creeps slowly towards him. Nearer and nearer he creeps, a wicked leer playing about his savage face. Apparently nothing can save Reginald. The knife is slowly lifted and held quivering above the fair-haired cowboy. Suddenly a wild Irish yell rings through the theater and Mr. McGuire dashes on the stage just in time to save his offspring. One blow lays Red Barlow stiff on the boards, another stretches the bad Indian beside him, while a third, delivered somewhat carelessly, stretches the rescued son beside his enemies.

SILAS MARNER (2-part Drama—Oct. 24).—Silas Marner awoke one morning at the age of twenty-five, and discovered that he had nothing left to live for His good name, his friends and the woman he loved had been removed from his reach by one unexpected thunderbolt of fate. Called to watch at the bedside of a dying deacon, he had nodded and fallen asleep. While he slept, the man he had always called his friend, crept softly in, stole the church money left in the deacon's charge and left Silas' knife in an incriminating position. Silas' bare word was insufficient to carry any weight against the mass of circumstantial evidence His frenzied protestations were met with cold glances and open scorn So, at last, Silas crept away from the friends of his youth and went to live alone in a dilapidated old stone house on the outskirts of a small village, supporting himself with his hand loom and hoarding his money with a miser's greed.

Silas came home one afternoon and discovered that his money bags had been stolen. Returning from a fruitless search for the thief he found a little girl lying asleep on the hearth. Her coming changed the entire tenor of his life. From a morbid, self-centered miser, Silas was changed into a generous, free-hearted, kindly nature. Only one person in the village knew the true story of Effie's origin. This person was Godfrey Cass, the squire Effie was his child by a bitterly-repented early marriage. Her mother's death allowed Godfrey to make the brilliant match he had set his heart on. He therefore said nothing and allowed Silas to think he had adopted a nameless waif. Years later Godfrey repented of his early silence. He offered to give Effie the home and money that rightfully belonged to her, but Effie, erect and glorious in her young womanhood, chose to stay with Silas and refused the tardy amends of her real father

A PROPOSAL FROM—NOBODY (Being the fourth story of "Who Will Marry Mary?"—Oct. 25).—When Irma Chatterton invited Mary Cuyler to spend a month at her camp in the Maine woods, Mary, delighted at the opportunity of escaping from her social and business responsibilities, accepted joyfully. Mrs. Chatterton, filled with the maternal impulse of all happily married people to get everybody else in the world safely married, saw to it that Vivian Duncan, a brilliant young politician [illegible] splendid prospects, should make one of the [illegible] party Arriving in camp Mary was instantly attracted by the looks of Jacques, a French [illegible] a tall, powerful man with gleaming, [illegible] and arrangements were forthwith [illegible] would be her personal guide during [illegible] day Mary and her guide set off on a fishing trip. Jacques, the half-breed, always queer and half insane, was swept over the borderland into madness by his close proximity with this fascinating woman of another world, and when Mary coldly rebuked him, he landed and carried her to a little cabin in the woods Here he swore she should stay until she would consent to marry him Meanwhile, the Chattertons were growing distinctly uneasy over Mary's absence, and welcomed Duncan's suggestion that he go and hunt for her Duncan found the beached canoe and readily traced them to the cabin by a shoe and handkerchief Mary had dropped in her struggle When Duncan arrived, Jacques was playing with a sharp knife and watching Mary with a wild gleam in his eyes Duncan sprang on him, and a fierce fight ensued in which the politician was the victor. Jacques, cowed by the other's superior physical strength and will, slunk off into the woods and Duncan took Mary back to camp

That afternoon a telegram came for Mary. It reached camp at the very moment that Duncan was seated beside her telling her in a quiet, eager voice how much he liked her Mary tore open the telegram. It informed her that unknown persons had brought suit against her mining property, and that she was in grave danger of losing her fortune. Duncan changed countenance at the news, and excused himself abruptly. Poor Mary stared after him. "They don't love me at all," she said, "it's just my money."

This man is on a 220 volt circuit and as his moving picture lamp only requires 35 volts at the arc, he formerly used a rheostat to reduce the voltage. In this way he paid for about 3 times as much "juice" as he actually needed.

Then he figured he needed this money more than the Lighting Company and he bought a

FORT WAYNE COMPENSARC

Now he gets a clearer, whiter, more intense unflickering light and his bills are only about 1 3 what they were before. The machine has three adjustments and the circuit can not break for even an instant in passing from one to another. No delays, no bother, no waste, no danger, no heat.

Send today for our 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat." It tells you how you can get a much better light at 1 3 your present cost.

ACROSS SWIFTCURRENT PASS ON HORSEBACK (Oct. 27).—Swiftcurrent Pass is in the northwestern part of the State of Montana in one of the wildest and most inspiring parts of the Rocky Mountains The scenery is equalled in sheer grandeur by few spots in the world. The trip across the Pass was made by a party of adventurous young men from the East The hardships and dangers of the trip are strikingly exemplified in several parts of the picture On a very considerable part of the ride, a bad stumble would mean almost certain death to the horse and no inconsiderable danger to the rider. Interesting pictures of Western camp life are shown; cooking flapjacks for breakfast, loading pack animals, etc.

A HORNET'S NEST (Oct. 27).—While on their summer vacation. Joan and Susie found a hornet's nest that they brought back to the city with them. Shortly after their return, Susie's young man, Dick Moreton, came to call on her. Susie's family at the time was suffering hideous torture on account of the family overhead, who made objectionable noises at all hours of the day and night.

Filled with a wild and helpless rage, Susie's father promised Dick his full consent to the marriage of the two young people on condition that Dick should instantly throw the objectionable neighbors out of the house. Dick rushed upstairs and ordered the noisy family to leave the building. The noisy family replied by throwing Dick down the stairs Dick picked himself up and reported to his fiancee that the family upstairs seemed very unwilling to leave, and that he did not have the heart to throw them out bodily.

During one of the warmer moments of Dick's dispute with the noisy family, a large section of plaster fell from the ceiling in the apartment below. As luck would have it the plaster fell directly on the box containing the hornet's nest. A few hundred hornets flew out. When Dick returned from his unsuccessful mission, he was met by a family who had little interest in anything but hornets. After he had been stung twice himself, Dick got an idea. Carefully placing the cover on the box containing the supposed bird's nest, he carried it upstairs, and dumped it out on the noisy family's floor. The noisy family left very quickly indeed, and Dick returned as a conquering hero

A DAUGHTER OF THE WILDERNESS (Oct. 28).—Jean Dutard, a habitant of the Canadian woods, has a beautiful daughter, Annette It is his ambition to have her marry Philip Boileau, a young woodsman. Annette, despite her dislike for Boileau, dares not rebel against her father's wishes.

One day, Gerald Austin, a young American camper, gets off his usual trail and stops at the Dutard's to inquire his way Dutard gives him the directions, but Austin pays little attention to them because he has suddenly caught sight of Annette. Dutard angrily orders the girl into the house and dismisses Austin coldly.

Austin takes every opportunity to grow more intimate with Annette. One day Dutard surprises them together in the forest He orders Annette home and threatens to kill Austin if he does not leave the woods. Austin follows Dutard back to his house and saves Annette from a whipping. With the assistance of Boileau, Dutard overpowers Austin, carries him out into the woods, and tying him to a sapling, leaves him to the tender mercies of hunger, exposure and the wolves Dutard sends for the priest and makes immediate preparations for marrying Annette to Boileau. Cowed by her father's will, the girl dares not protest and proceeds with the ceremony until the moment when the priest asks her if she will take Boileau as her lawfully wedded husband. Her love for Austin overcomes her fears, and in a tensely dramatic moment she tells the priest the whole condition of affairs.

A powerful scene follows in which the fearless priest completely dominates the two savage woodsmen by sheer strength of personality. Guided by Annette, he effects Austin's release and then marries the two lovers. Later he returns to Dutard, lectures him severely on the error of his ways and persuades him to turn over a new leaf.

daughter, Kathleen, who is [illegible] fond of [illegible] Harold Gritt, a travelling salesman for the Eureka Cork Company. Since corks are used in whiskey bottles, Mr. Gritt's occupation seems very questionable to Mr. Drywun.

An election is about to be held in the nearby city of Buckford and a campaign is being waged between the prohibitionists and the liquor interests. Mr. Drywun and his neighbor, Mr. Waters leave for the battleground, where they are joined by another prohibitionist, Grape Juice Bill Ryan. An old actor, Reginald Barrystone, reads in the daily paper that one John Jones who has posed for several years as a "Horrible Example" at prohibitionists' meetings has finally passed away by the ripe old age of a hundred and two. Since he is out of work at the time Barrystone decides to apply for the situation. A careful make up secures the position for him and he succeeds as a "Horrible Example" in a far more emphatic manner than he has ever succeeded on the stage.

In the course of his business travels Mr. Gritt happens to come to Buckford just before the election, when the campaigning is in full blast. He meets Miss Kathleen Drywun and is severely reprimanded by Father Drywun for his unwelcome attention. Filled with admiration for the beautiful girl, Gritt evolves a scheme.

He bribes the old actor to let him take his place as the "Horrible Example." The old actor enters into the scheme enthusiastically, helps Gritt make up and coaches him in his part. Gritt is an even greater success than the old actor. During the course of the evening he succeeds in substituting a bottle of suspicious odor for the bottle of tonic Mr. Drywun habitually carried around with him for his throat. The new tonic has a surprising effect upon Mr. Drywun. It makes him unwontedly benevolent. He feels that all men are his brothers, particularly the "Horrible Example." In a burst of enthusiastic generosity he tells the "Horrible Example" that he will be delighted to grant him any reasonable request. He is somewhat surprised when the "Horrible Example" asks him for his daughter. For a few moments Mr. Drywun is rebellious, but realizing that Gritt holds the whip hand over him, he at length capitulates as gracefully as possible.

JANET OF THE DUNES (Special—2 parts—Oct. 31).—When John Devant was a young man he fell violently in love with a girl in the little Long Island town wherein he spent his summers. He persuaded her to marry him and took her back to the city. The girl, although beautiful in her native country, faded perceptibly in the city. After a time Devant tired of her. A short trip abroad, ostensibly for business purposes, was lengthened by him first to a month, then to six months, then to a year. The tired wife, friendless and alone in the city, waited until her heart grew cold and dead. Then she crept back to the home of her childhood, taking with her Devant's child, a little girl whom she called Janet. The good salt air was too late to save Mrs. Devant. She died the day after she arrived, and Captain Billy, who had loved her all his life, swore that he would protect her little daughter. Eighteen years later Janet had grown into a beautiful woman. One day she discovered a secret way of getting into one of the beautiful houses belonging to the summer colony. In the library of this house she used to sit for days at a time wading through the splendid collection of books. One day John Devant, the owner of the house, came to it unexpectedly and surprised her there. He was momentarily startled by the girl's appearance, listened with interest to her explanation and readily granted her permission to use the books at any time.

Richard Thornley, a friend of Mr. Devant, came upon Janet one day on the dunes and, struck by her pulchritude, begged to be allowed to paint her. An intimacy sprang up between them that was rather a frank, buoyant comradeship than anything else. The arrival of a young lady from the city spoiled it all. She discovered Janet waiting for the artist in his studio and made several unpleasant observations. Janet, with a sudden realization of what the artist really thought of her, dismissed him with a few curt words and he left for the city, tormented by conflicting desires. A short absence from Janet showed him that he could not live without her. He returned and clasped Janet in his arms and told her he would have none other for his wife. A chance photograph led to Devant's discovery that Janet was his daughter. The remorseful father welcomed Janet and Richard with open arms and promised himself to atone for his harshness to the mother by his love for the child.

A WOODLAND PARADISE (Nov. 1).—The poet and his daughter lived an intensely simple life in the heart of the woods far from town. He loved to sit in the shade of a tree and read the poems of Dante, Gabriel, Rossetti, to his daughter. Eve, the daughter, privately considered Dante, Gabriel, Rossetti something of a bore, but she did not tell her father so, for fear of hurting his aesthetic feelings.

In accordance with his advanced ideas, the poet had taken pains to keep his daughter in entire seclusion from the rest of the world. She had never seen any other man but her father. In addition to his wild poetic yearnings, the poet maintained throughout a strain of shrewd native common sense. He rode to town one morning and interviewed Amos Munroe, the real estate agent. The poet owned a tract of woodland in close proximity to his house, which he desired Amos to undertake to sell. There were, however, certain peculiar conditions attached to this transaction. Amos was to see that the [illegible] of the property was a young man—an attractive young man, if possible—and Amos was to make sure that the aforesaid attractive young man was rich.

Adam Milford, a wealthy young broker, saw the real estate advertisement in the paper, and, since he wanted a desirable location for a summer camp, inspected the property, and bought it. He erected a comfortable cabin, in which he decided to spend the remaining part of the summer.

One day, while he was wandering through the woods, he met Eve. It is not exactly common for a girl to meet a man and marry him the same week, but that is just what Adam and Eve did, showing that there is something in a name after all.

ESSANAY.

THY WILL BE DONE (Oct. 28).—Mrs. Mulligan, although in poor circumstances, takes the child of her neighbor, who has just passed into another world, to live with her. Dotty becomes quite chummy with Tom, one of Mrs. Mulligan's sons, and during the child's saddest hours Tom comforts her. Tom proposes that Dotty write a letter to her mother in heaven asking her to come back. The letter is given to the mail man who delivers it to the post office superintendent. This superintendent, just having lost his own daughter, persuades his wife to adopt Dotty. The pathetic scene that takes place between the superintendent's wife and the child is one mothers will never forget.

CUPID AND THREE (Oct. 29).—Arthur and Ben are friendly rivals for the hand of Celia. Celia, however, prefers Ben and tries to discourage Arthur. Arthur is a little bit peeved when the girl he loves passes him up for Ben, and the soldier of love determines that revenge will be sweet. That afternoon Arthur borrows his sister's dress and makes Ben take him for a ride in his roadster. Of course Celia sees Ben with the supposed lady and proceeds to get jealous. You can imagine the surprise and humiliation Celia suffers when at "Patricola's Tango Tea" she finds a photograph of Ben with the lady of the afternoon. The tables are turned and Arthur is again forced to suffer for his indiscreet actions. Just see how Celia turned the tables.

GREED FOR GOLD (Oct. 30).—Greed for gold, this is what has dragged many a man downward. Skinflint, a miser, not satisfied with the gold he hoards, tries to make a practice of selling whiskey to the Indians, taking from them practically all the gold they possess for just a few glasses of the fire water. Skinflint might have succeeded had it not been for Bill Riley, a prospector, who quickly takes the bottle of intoxicating liquor from the Indian and smashes it on a nearby rock. Skinflint becomes enraged and determines to get even. That afternoon the Indian becomes intoxicated from the whiskey he finally purchased from the miser. Many tangled situations are straightened out that develop from the miser selling the Indian the fire water.

THE TOLL OF THE MARSHES (Special—2 parts—Oct. 31).—Like most young men working in the city and making a small salary, John Hammond determines to take his mother South, to buy a small piece of property, work a piece of farm land and live independently. Mrs. Hammond knowing more of the world than her son, pleads with him to continue where he is, that the future would probably be brighter. John, however, like most sons, prevails upon his mother and wins out. He secures her permission to invest their savings, a few hundred dollars, into some land in the Southern state. Enthused over their new acquisition they leave for the farm country immediately. Their confidence in men and the good things in life are shattered, when they discover that their "farm" is nothing more or less than swamp land. Without funds they are forced to remain there until they can earn enough to take them back to the North. We are taken back to the office of the Land President, where we see him gloating over his victims and furnishing his wife with the hard sweat and blood-stained money his investors had so willingly given up to him. Is there a punishment too severe for a man of his calibre? John and his mother manage to make a bare living harvesting flags, but this cannot last forever, as Mrs. Hammond is gradually becoming a victim of malaria. Secure in their retreat the swindlers of the land company think little of their suffering victims, of the infant offspring who had died and are dying of the terrible diseases that are so easily bred in that low, swampy marsh land. Is it any wonder that these people lost their faith in man and god?

Business combined with pleasure makes it necessary for Rogers, the president of this so-called land company, to take a trip to the South. The hotel, the best the town affords and perhaps the best hostelry in the State, is none too good for this man and his family, who make their expensive living from the poor, and these illgotten gains bring every happiness possible to Rogers' wife and child. Did we say every happiness? Tired of sitting about the hotel, Josephine, the twelve-year-old daughter of the land swindler, becomes restless and urges John, the chauffeur, to take her for a ride into the country. While repairing the car, Josephine sneaks quietly away and gets lost in the marsh lands. Exhausted and completely worn out, Mrs. Hammond is an easy victim to the hot sun playing on her head and falls prostrated from the heat. John runs for a doctor. On his return from the doctor's house he finds Josephine stuck fast in the treacherous marsh, clinging to the weeds for her life. Rogers is notified that his child is lost. The man who had robbed the poor for his own selfish sake, forgets all of the money he controls and risks his life in Swampville, searching for his daughter. The enraged victims try to shoot him. He offers reimbursements to all in case his child is restored to him. Hammond carries

I have made a contract under which BOSWORTH INCORPORATED has the right to make moving pictures of all my works. BOSWORTH INCORPORATED has made a fine seven-reel picture of THE SEA WOLF, authenticated over my signature with twenty-five feet of moving pictures of myself writing at my desk. All other films made by BOSWORTH INCORPORATED will be similarly authenticated.

Unauthorized persons are raiding my copyrights and are attempting to sell to exhibitors moving pictures of my novels and stories, including a three-reel picture of THE SEA WOLF.

It is necessary in order for me to protect my rights by suits for injunctions and damages to know immediately in whatever city these unauthorized films may be exhibited.

Wherefore I ask all my friends to notify me immediately whenever such unauthenticated films are exhibited or advertised to be exhibited. Signed, JACK LONDON, Glenellen, Calif.

the child to his tent where the doctor is attending his mother. Medical attention is given her. Mrs. Hammond pulls through all right. Rogers returns the money for the aid to Hammond. Mother and son agree to return to the North and Josephine is restored to her father.

THE DOCTOR'S DUTY (Nov. 1).—Dr. [illegible] White falls in love with Marguerite, the daughter of the postmaster in a small Western town. He asks her to marry him, but she refuses as she is already engaged to Fred Church, the express messenger. Some time later, after the proposal, the doctor receives an invitation to the wedding of Church and Marguerite, which shatters what little hope he had of ever winning the girl. A few days before the marriage is to take place, Church is held up and shot by bandits, and taken, in a serious condition, to Dr. White's home. The doctor knows that Church is absolutely at his mercy and that the least negligence on his part will result in the death of the man. For a moment he is tempted, but his sense of duty and honor finally prevails and by a slight operation he saves the life of his rival, for the girl he loves.

THE SPINNERS OF SPEECH (Oct. 28).—A most interesting industrial film showing the telephone "behind the scenes." Everyone makes use of this wonderful servant of civilized man, but very few persons realize the remarkable mechanism and intimate correlation of parts that combine to serve them whenever they talk over the wire. Here are shown linemen setting poles through the wilderness and stringing wires. Then the individual lines meeting upon the great pole lines leading to the big central offices. Then the gathering of wires into cables connecting with the switchboards with their thousands of tiny flashing lights. Here also is shown the laying of the submarine cables that carry the voice under the water, thus overcoming the barriers of flood, tide and distance.

WHEN CHILDHOOD WINS (Oct. 29).—Marion Hall marries a young artist against the wishes of her father, who thereupon refuses to have anything to do with her. Years later her little daughter while out with her nurse, meets an old gentleman who takes an immediate fancy to her. Later the child recognizes from an old photo, her chance acquaintance as her grandfather. She goes to his [illegible] with the photo, tells him that she is his granddaughter and begs him to become reconciled with her mother. In the face of his absolute refusal she calls him up on the 'phone several days later from her house, tells him she is ill and asks him to come and see her. He does so, meets her mother, and a reconciliation follows.

IN LOVE AND WAR (Special—2 parts—Oct. 30).—A young army officer, stationed in a country village falls in love with a beautiful girl of the people and wins her complete trust and adoration. War breaks out and he leaves for the front, promising to marry her on his return. She hears no word from him, and broken hearted goes to the city, where she is employed as maid by a beautiful girl in society. The lover returns from war, meets the maiden's mistress and, faithless to his former love, woos and wins her. By accident the deserted sweetheart discovers the identity of her mistress' fiancé and her secret is disclosed. With noble self-renunciation the mistress breaks her engagement and insists upon the marriage of man and maid.

LOVE'S DECEPTION (Oct. 31).—Frank and Durry, two brothers, love the same girl. As is often the case, the one who least deserves it—Durry, is the one favored by the girl, while Frank who possesses much greater depth of character, finds that being a cripple is a serious handicap for Cupid to combat. The girl's father wisely sees that the favored brother is of unstable character, and insists that Durry must first show that he is competent to win his way in the world before the parental consent to the marriage will be given. Both brothers leave for Colorado—Frank because he sees his love is hopeless, Durry to try for business success. Frank insists upon the shallow Durry corresponding with the distant sweetheart and when he balks, dictates the correspondence himself. Durry cheats at cards and pays the penalty the West demands for his offence—death. The surviving brother, fearing to break the news to the girl, keeps up the correspondence in Durry's name. The girl comes West and—the film tells the rest.

TOO MANY TENANTS (Nov. 1).—A young and penniless artist attempts to gain the good will of his successful uncle by writing him that he has purchased a fine studio residence. His uncle, examining the photo of the house which is sent him, recognizes it, and determines upon a visit to his nephew. In the meantime, the house has been rented by the mother of the artist's sweetheart. The anxious nephew learns of his uncle's proposed visit and endeavors to head off the approaching trouble. The real tenants, the young man and the uncle all arrive at the house at about the same time and things begin to happen.

BIOGRAPH.

AN EVENING WITH WILDER SPENDER (Oct. 27).—Auntie Alice, straight from the Baptist Convention, hoped Wilder had been conducting himself as a spender should. He had, all right. Then Dottie Dewdrop fainted behind the screen. That was enough. It could be no accident, but Auntie soon learned the truth of the old saying, "Accidents may happen even in the best regulated families."

THE CLOCK STOPPED (Nov. 1).—No doubt the old antique dealer was prejudiced against his junior clerk. After frequent shortages, the clerk's visit to the gambling house was reported by the detective and he was discharged. In truth, he had gone to find the senior clerk, who owed him money which he needed for his mother, hovering close to the edge of life. By sharp detective work, the designs of the senior clerk were frustrated.

A BARBER CURE (Oct. 30).—Off he went to lunch with Flossie Fluff, the gay and dapper young barber he was. But lo, Count Duberry was to dine that day with Floss. His table manners! Don't mention them. The barber should have been glad he was dismissed, but he wasn't. He got back at Duberry. Count indeed! Waiter No. 23.

BOARDERS AND BOMBS (Oct. 30).—The "Hamfats" were stranded again. Ye Gods, what would these poor "Hamfats" have done but for Ikey's five dollar willie, which he gave for Horatio Hillenbuck's coat. That was how they roomed in a room, "no cooking allowed." But what cared they? To the feast, they ran the gauntlet from Shakespeare to East Lynne. No wonder Landlord Frittineuchen shouted "Anarchists."

THE CONSCIENCE FUND (Special—2 parts—Oct. 6).—Hawke, president of the cigar trust, has been posted on the club board for membership. "The Man in the Street" observes this with dismay, and surreptiously pockets the card. Street visits the convent of "The White Sisters" and greets Sister Nell. It is then revealed that Hawke is their father, and through his business dealing is considered by them unworthy of membership in the club. She is much troubled by the revelation of her brother and concludes to persuade their father to clear his conscience. Sister Nell visits her father and demands that he redeem his past by giving back his stolen fortune. After years of estrangement, Street also calls upon his father, and emphasizes the message that his sister has conveyed, but he is ordered from the house by his irate parent.

At a garden party Sister Nell is collecting funds for good work. Here she meets her father, and they are introduced as strangers. He tosses a roll of fills into the charity dish, but she produces his application for membership in the club and tells him she will not accept his money until he gives back to the government all that he owes. She and her brother again meet and she tells him to inform the club of Hawke's ineligibility, and if he will not do so, she will. She then visits the club and is refused admittance by the doorman, but she nursed his daughter back to life, so he kindly directs her to the fire-escape as a means of admission. She takes advantage of this offer, enters the committeeroom through the window, declares that Hawke is ineligible and advises that they have the club detective investigate.

Hawke, seated in his private office, is tortured by two visions of the past. The first shows Hawke's brother and partner, dead of heart failure, in the act of writing a confession, telling how for years they had declared only half their output for internal revenue, thus swindling the government. His son and daughter show him this confession, and he, after acknowledging its validity, burns it. Both lift the finger of scorn, crying "Thief!" In the second vision is revealed the convent, where the daughter, now a sister, is visited by her brother. He sees himself in the shadow, and is stung with remorse as they coldly stare at him. He determines upon restitution. He goes to the bank, draws $200,000, and addresses the package to "The Conscience Fund," U. S. Treasury, Washington, D. C. He then goes down to his garage, dons overalls, smudges his face, takes the package to the express company, gives it in as of "no value," concealing his own identity.

The next scene shows the amazement at the capital at the reception of such a large sum, which is entered as "credit to a cigarmaker." Sister Nell and Brother Street read in the papers the story of the largest contribution that has ever been made to the "Conscience Fund" and recognizes their father as the contributor. Nell declares that it is not enough and that Hawke must give all he has. They visit their father and Street informs him that he will be blackballed by the club unless he complies with their request. He promises to do so, is elected to the club, and then instantly dies of heart failure. The following morning it is read with astonishment that Hawke's heirs are "The Man in the Street" and Sister Nell, who inherit his estate of $3,000,000.

A later scene shows the pair preparing to complete the redemption of their father. Nell brings her brother the robe and cowl of a Franciscan padre, and he takes the entire fortune to Washington, leaving it at the office of "The Conscience Fund."

The last scene shows him back in his club, reading the order of the Secret Service: "Find that padre who left $3,000,000 at the office of 'The Conscience Fund.'" He and his sister alone know the secret, and they are satisfied in that they have not betrayed their father's name or his sin.

THE FINGER PRINT (Special—2 parts—Oct. 20). —Two boys, Dan Woods, son of a poor widow, and Bert Ainslie, the scion of a rich one, are introduced in college. The scene opens at the tennis court on the college campus, then comes the girl, Nellie Wilson, beloved of both, but favoring the poor youth, Dan.

The boys are about to leave college for vacation, and in the rush, the janitor throws a pair of tennis pumps belonging to Dan in Bert's trunk. Dan's mother, a widow, greets him proudly at the station. In contrast Bert is surrounded by all the luxuries that wealth can furnish, but this does not make, but rather seems to mar the man, for when Bert appears upon the scene, the chambermaid and all the other help rush for cover, as his hand is more free than glad. The chambermaid having escaped his clutches, rushes from the room, leaving the door of the safe open, where she has but recently placed a valuable pearl necklace of her mistress. The butler takes charge of the young man, who is much the worse for liquor and persuades him to go to bed.

His confidant, the gambler, who accompanied him to the door, assumes his true role as a crook—climbs through the window and picks up various articles of value in the room (among others, the curling tongs that blacken his fingers). He then spies the safe and takes from it the string of pearls.

When morning dawns the poor maid sleepily appears, catches sight of the open safe. The alarm becomes general, but the cowardly Bert slinks out of trouble that his sober senses tell him is impending. Jealousy, however, still fans the flame in his breast and he discovers the tennis shoes belonging to his rival. He takes these shoes and throws them down near a fence that the burglar had evidently climbed over in making his escape. He returns to the house and the police and detectives arrive and the latter following the trail of the burglar, pick up the tennis shoes.

The action shifts to the humble home of Dan Woods, where they are at breakfast. A plain-clothes man confronts Dan with an air that immediately alarms. His question is concerning the athletic shoes peculiarly marked that have been "planted" by the tricky Bert, so that the detectives could hardly overlook them. His arrest follows; his poor mother falls fainting to the floor.

Ill news travels fast, and Dan's sweetheart comes to the little hamlet by the first train. Again the scene changes to the office of "Muntone, the great detective." The money retainer offered to secure the pearls, is exciting comment in the realms of the thief catchers. Nellie, the sweetheart, visits the great detective and her importunings work mightier magic than the offers of big money. Muntone concludes to take up the case she pleads. Strangely enough, the great man does not appear as the police expert at all, but a ginseed rustic happens along in the neighboring bar, where the guilty gamblers and the astute ones are working out clues concerning the conviction of Dan Woods. He has more than one trick up his sleeve, however, and that is an inked cuff. One of the gamblers accidentally rubs his thumb against his rural neighbor's cuff, which has been carefully inked. The impress of his thumb is then transferred to the cards that the gambler is handling. Muntone palms the cards so accidentally marked, passes them through the window to his assistant on the outside, who compares it with the thumb marks on the handle of the curling iron that was dropped the night of the robbery. They coincide, the link of evidence is complete—the gambler is arrested black-handed; the pearls are recovered. Dan Woods is vindicated and released.

THE DANGLING NOOSE (Oct. 31).—Indian Jim is indicted by short shrift for a crime punishable by death, according to the code of the primeval. Watkins finds the bed of creek dry one morning, the water strangely having changed its course in a night. His options in that territory cover considerable land along the water right, but he has not the necessary money to cover the deal before his option expires. Bill is in love with Rose Watkins, and the deadly enemy of her friend and protector, Indian Jim, who looms up as having designs on the water rights. While Watkins went on a hopeless quest to borrow money, Bill was about to close the option, when he found that his own money was missing. Circumstantial evidence pointed to Indian Jim as the thief, and the excitable mountaineers immediately conveyed him to a convenient tree. When confronted by the death penalty in the dangling noose, the stolid Aborigine confessed that he had taken the money, but refused any further explanation. Bill, unsatisfied despite his enmity, sought to prevent the Indian's execution, but was thrust aside. Rose, in a frenzy of alarm at the predicament of her friend, broke into the dynamite house, and securing sticks of the explosive, tosses one over the cliff, to arouse the inhabitants in the settlement below. Another she uses to hold back the crowd until Watkins arrives and stays proceedings. The Indian then confesses that he had taken the money to save the option for Rose. Bill, in amazement declares that he raised the money for the same purpose for Rose's sake; then a very tense, dramatic situation changes into hilarious comedy as the crowd of would-be lynchers join in Watkins' hearty laugh. Indignant that her love affairs should provoke such merriment she will not be pacified until Bill's arm steals about her and she defies the laughing crowd and leaves Indian Jim the hero of the occasion, instead of becoming the unfortunate victim of the sinister noose dangling above his head.

OLD DOC YAK AND THE ARTIST'S DREAM (Oct. 30).—Of course, the artist is behind in his work, for that, he is an artist; and the impertinent office boy reproves him—for that, he is an office boy. Sleepily and automatically he draws a picture of Doc Yak and then, awakening, throws him into the discard in the waste-basket. Then he plunges into his work again; then cat-naps. There is a vibratory stir in the basket; Doc Yak comes to life and climbs out, and thereafter becomes a very active feature in the animated comicalities that line up and disappear in this merry mystery.

WHEN MAY WEDS DECEMBER (Oct. 28).—Mrs. Lorne, a social parasite, with a beautiful daughter, is so closely pressed by her creditors, that she uses her beautiful child as an asset, urging her to accept the offer of the hand of an aged banker, Black, old enough to be her grandfather. This doddering magnate has an ungovernable temper that brings such immediate and sharp unhappiness to the young woman that she soon leaves him and seeks solace in a lonely resort at the seashore. The months fly by and the disappearance of the young wife is an unsolved mystery, until the body of a young woman washed ashore, is identified by banker Black as his wife by the clothing she wears. Strangely enough, she reads this account of her own presumable death in the paper, but she has learned to love a young author at the lonely resort, and visits her aged husband, hoping to get his consent to free her from her bonds. Her appearance at his hotel before him, as one returned from the dead, gives him such a shock, that he almost dies of heart failure. His valet, who has stood his abuse for years, manages to bring him back to life, but Black is in such a fit of temper, that he attempts to destroy the faithful servant and in the struggle that ensues, the latter kills him. The valet immediately surrenders himself to the police, arguing he acted in self-defense. Mrs. Black has now become free and eventually returns to those who have become more to her than mere money, and makes her home where her heart is.

TWO SACKS OF POTATOES (Oct. 29).—A ranchman goes to town with a view to drawing considerable money for a business deal. Three hold-up men ascertain the object of his trip, plan to waylay him, but are afraid to do so in daylight, so they decide to hide in the ranch house until he returns. He leaves in charge of the place his daughter, a brave and resourceful girl, and the hold-up men are doubtful about the best manner of getting into the house without exciting her suspicion. They meet a wagon on the way to the ranch to deliver two sacks of potatoes. They tie up the driver, empty his sacks, and two of the rascals get into the sacks, while the third drives the wagon to the ranch. He succeeds in getting the sacks into the house, when the girl detects their contents and persuades him to take the "potatoes" into the cellar, where they belong. He does so, thinking to free his friends for further operations, but when they are fairly below the floor the girl slams down the trapdoor, gets her gun and piles the furniture on the door, so that the men cannot get out. On his way home the ranchman comes across the unfortunate driver, who was tied up to a tree by the rascals, and learns his story. He releases him and they hasten on to the ranch. They arrive just in time to save the girl, who has fired her last shot, from the hands of the irate villains, and secure the latter for the sheriff.

A MUDDLE IN HORSE THIEVES (Oct. 29).—Tom Mix picks up a horse, but being hard pressed and finding the animal is giving out, he passes a cowpuncher who has dismounted to take a drink, and takes possession of the fresh mount and gets away, despite the fact that he is fired at. His last victim follows after him, but is himself overtaken by a posse, who accuse him of being the thief. The real villain, however, riding forward, passes an old man driving a team, who recognizes the horse as the property of his son, so he joins in the pursuit. The horse thief, now closely pressed, takes to a motorcycle, but the old man looks keenly over the heavy barrel of his Winchester and brings him out of the saddle while the machine is going at full speed.

THE PENDULUM OF FATE (Special—2 parts—Oct. 27).—Lord Philip Milburne, threatened with disinheritance by his father, the Earl of Milburne, has kept his marriage a secret for almost a quarter of a century. Lord Philip has a grown-up son and daughter and adores his wife, but the seal of secrecy has kept them out of Milburne Manor. The Earl passes out of life suddenly and is attended by his younger son, Robert, who is a most cruel and unnatural person. The new Earl Philip writes his wife that he can now acknowledge her and their marriage certificate that has long moldered in a hiding place, secret even from her. The younger brother, with heart full of hatred and curiosity, observes him penning this letter, and by using opera glasses ascertains the contents of the letter. During the return trip of the Earl of Milburne the train on which he is a passenger is wrecked and he is killed. The wife gets the letter and repairs immediately to Milburne Mansion with her son and daughter, but Lord Robert meets them at the door, denounces them as impostors and denies their right to see the dead. Returning home, Lady Milburne almost succumbs to grief, but realizing their desperate situation might be relieved if the marriage certificate were found, she confers with her son, and he starts out with a determination to find that coveted document. Then, as if to pile meanness upon inhumanity, Robert Milburne appears upon the scene of their happy home, orders them to pack their personal effects and vacate the premises at once.

The impoverished family of Milburne are discovered in a meagerly furnished room, the mother still prostrated, the daughter, Elizabeth, eking out an existence by painting china. To add to their wretchedness, Philip has discovered that the church in which his mother was married was burned down and all the parochial records destroyed. Then, when he returns to their old home, Fernside Cottage, in hopes that the document may be hidden there, he finds that the remorseless Uncle Robert has anticipated such search and seemingly thoroughly ransacked the house. While he is satisfying himself as to this, a hired bravo in the pay of his lordly uncle overpowers him and he is incarcerated in a private insane asylum as a dangerous maniac. He endures a month of this life and then breaks away from his keepers and escapes. In his flight he scrambles over the wall of Lady Mary Seton's country place, falls in an exhausted condition, where he is discovered by the gentle hostess. She has him taken to her home and encourages him to tell her the truth about himself. He does so, and begs her to find his mother and sister, which she fortunately does.

During Lady Mary's visit Elizabeth, the daughter, observes an advertisement of the sale of their old home, Fernside Cottage. Her emotions overpower her and Lady Mary asks the reason. When she learns of the sale she quietly buys the place herself. Accompanied by Philip, Lady Mary goes to the house, and Robert Milburne happens along and observes that he has forgotten his brother Philip's picture, asking if he may take it with him. She acquiesces and calls a servant to take down the picture. It slips from his hands and the paper covering the back tears loose, revealing the long sought for marriage certificate. Both see the document, and the crafty Robert can hardly restrain himself from immediately destroying it. Lady Mary goes from the room a moment and he takes advantage of her absence to light a match and is about to burn it, gloatingly, when Lady Mary returns, and, snatching it from him, calls the young man, Philip, who rushes between them. She hands the certificate to the real Duchess, while the stalwart Philip stops the rush of his wicked uncle, and sends him down for the count. This is the cap sheaf of that bad man's discomfiture, for Lady Mary, who has rescued her friends, will now put them into rightful possession of their own. The reunited family, their fortune secure, surround the good angel who has restored them to their home and wiped the blot from the family escutcheon.

JOKER.

THE TRAMP DENTISTS (Oct. 29).—Dusty and Weary, two knights of the road, awake from their haystack Pullman, and having an awful thirst, and no coin, are forced to take a drink from a horse trough. This unexpected blow causes Dusty to have an awful toothache, and the two, after administering gasoline and various other sedatives, go to the dentist's office. Being "broke," the dentist kicks them out, and they seek food and consolation from a friendly garbage can.

The dentist is now summoned on board Mr. Richfeller's private yacht, "The Yale," to fill an "aching void" in Mr. Richfeller's tooth, and while fuming with his rich patient the steamer leaves port and the dentist is forced to make a sea voyage of several weeks. Meanwhile, with the aid of skeleton keys, the tramps enter the dentist's office. Weary quietly removes Dusty's aching tooth with an ice tong. Now, being unable to leave on account of the patients, who mistake them for the real dentist, the tramps conceive the idea of making some money by remaining dentists. Their gentle methods, with cold chisel, hammers, etc., win them all the trade, and when the old dentist returns, he finds them jewel-bedecked and lordly in sumptuous new offices.

Unable to get his old footing, the dentist and his faithful assistant are forced to take to tramping. The now prosperous tramps see the dentist and his assistant "shooting snipes" in the street in front of their offices, and the old longing for the "road" takes them. Calling the dentist and his assistant, they make them a proposition, whereby the two tramps exchange clothes with the dentist and his assistant, and with pockets bulging with bills, they find contentment by a small camp fire with some second-hand cigars.

THROWING THE BULL (Nov. 1).—Adolphus Heinrich Schultz little thought when he left Milwaukee as a wet goods salesman, that fate would throw him amid the perils of war. He lands in Mexico and by severely "cleaning" the city bully, gains the admiration of teh Insurrectos, who appoint him their leader. As he recruits his mismated troops, the Senorita Frigolla seeks his protection from her irate toreador lover, Don Chila. Seizing the toreador, Shultz orders his instant execution, but Donna Frigolla begs his life, and he is released on condition he joins Shultz's army.

Shultz leads his Insurrectos against the Federals and with cannon balls bouncing off from his manly chest, leads a victorious charge and after his whole company are slaughtered, he single-handed takes the Federal army prisoner. The treacherous Don Chila escapes in the abandoned drum of the Federals by rolling it with himself inside down the hill. He is recaptured, and with the Federal army confined in the city jail. Peace having come, the citizens decide on celebrating by a bull fight, but alas, the toreador, Don Chila, is in jail. Shultz again becomes the savior of the city and fights the bull to such advantage as to win the heart and hand of Donna Frigolla.

VICTOR.

THE RESTLESS SPIRIT (3 parts—Oct. 27).—The Restless Spirit idles and dreams while his wife and child come to want. He wanders out and at the top of a hill looks at his hands and sees that they are the hands of a man that the rod of Empire might have swayed. He wanders back to his poor home slowly and broodingly. The wife and child are helped by her father, who reproaches her for putting up with such a man, and the villagers view her husband with contempt.

The Dreamer resolves to seek fields anew, and is harried by a vision in which he sees himself as a musician, holding a vast audience at attention. He tells his wife he is going and despite her entreaties he wanders forth. The wife is taken in by her father, who introduces her to the sleek stranger—a contrast to her lazy and careless husband.

As the Dreamer goes, he is reviled by the townspeople, but he passes them sullenly and comes to the desert. He wanders on until exhausted, he falls, and is found by the Desert Flower, Pauline, who revives him and takes him to her hut. She, poor woman, has tasted the bitter fruits of deception and the face of her deceiver is ever before her in her haven of retreat and refuge.

He tells her of his ambitions, his hopes and desires. The woman sees the little baby shoe hanging [illegible]nd his neck, knows he is married, and endeavors [illegible] him go back. She shows him the vanity of [illegible] nd in a series of visions he sees himself [illegible] in the height of power, a victorious knight, a sultan. He sees himself as a rich man, discontented and grasping. He sees the path of glory which leads but to the grave with its endless procession of conquerors of men of might and means. He sees the end—the grave. The woman asks him whether his grave will be honored if he neglects his loved ones. He is conquered in his turn and she leads him out and sets him upon his way with a wistful look after him.

In the meantime, the wife is turned from her father's home for refusing to marry the sleek stranger.

The sleek stranger follows her with soft advances. The Dreamer meets them thus on the edge of the desert and sends the stranger into the waste while he returns with his wife and child to the town, where he braves the jeers of the people and cows the landlord. He confronts them all and silences them and sets to work diligently to right the wrong. The stranger wanders out into the desert towards the woman he wronged and who he will never see again. In time the Dreamer makes good and is both loved and respected.

NESTOR.

A MAN OF THE PEOPLE (Oct. 29).—Jim Brady is a bully and a drunkard. He leads Nell, his wife, a hard time. She often seeks refuge and sympathy at the home of the Bassets, where she is kindly received. Basset receives a letter from his brother, telling him that the former's son, recently ordained, is coming to town, and asking his help to establish him there. The young minister arrives and is welcomed. He sees Nell and promises to call upon her and see what he can do regarding her husband. Lee meets the minister and makes fun of him. He sees his wife talking to the minister and commands her to keep away from him.

Jim's ill treatment continues and the minister calls upon Nell. He is ordered out by Jim, who follows him downtown, where he goads the minister to knock him down. After enduring the taunts of the cowboys, the minister agrees to fight the bully and knocks him out.

Later, while a meeting is in progress, Jim fires the church and escapes, followed by the cowboys and the minister. Jim is followed and would have been lynched but for the timely interference of the minister, who saves him on the promise that he will attend services when the new church is built.

"CURSES!" SAID THE VILLAIN (Oct. 31).—The Sultan's Grand Visier has been on a holiday. On the returning steamer he sees Ramona, who is making a tour of the Orient with her father and her lover, Eddie. The Grand Visier awaits his chance and talks to Ramona: he kisses her, and Eddie, who rushes to the rescue, is foiled of his vengeance by the Visier and his servant. Arriving at the Oriental City, the Grand Visier tells the Sultan of the "peach" he has met, and the Sultan arranges to have the party invited to the palace.

Ramona and Eddie visit the Sultan, and seeing the Grand Visier there, are frightened and eventually get away. The Sultan lays a trap, the young couple are inveigled into taking a row on the water, and are overpowered by the Grand Visier and the servant, who are hiding on the boat. They are dragged to the palace and imprisoned. Ramona is taken to make the acquaintance of the Harem ladies.

Eddie breaks his bonds, finds a saw in the prison, cuts the floor boards and sees through the hole that the Sultan, Grand Visier and other Hoodledocks, are plotting against Ramona and Eddie.

Eddie escapes by knocking a guard down and entering the Sultan's laboratory, he knocks the learned doctor out and swipes his chloroform bottle. He returns to his prison, ties a sponge full of chloroform on a string, drops it on the Hookah pipe bowl. The villains are drugged, and this paves the way for the escape of Eddie and Ramona.

ECLAIR.

WIFIE MUST FOLLOW HUSBAND (Oct. 12).—When a man marries, his troubles begin—sometimes. Certainly Officer Nabbem's experience ran true to form in that respect. He met a lady of more determination than pulchritude, who had the advantage of him by two hundred and fifty pounds. Shortly after, he found himself married to said lady, Carrie Little by name. While the wedding feast was progressing, the officer received a message promising him promotion if he could catch "Mike the Rat," who had escaped. Nabbem got up to go—"Duty before pleasure, my love." "My love" had a mind of her own, and stated that "Wifie must follow husband," which she promptly proceeded to do, much to Nabbem's worriment.

The officer looks for his quarry in a dive. He is embraced by a bevy of turkey-trotters of the feminine persuasion, who want "The Rat" to escape. Carrie finds her new husband in this compromising position when she pants in after him. Then in truth she leads him a chase, he the while chasing "The Rat." The chase goes on up street, down street, over rock piles, through sprinkling wagon showers, across the ferry, aboard trolley cars, with Carrie always there. It ends in the door of an office building, where all three get tangled in the revolving entrance. Carrie rises to the situation by sitting upon "The Rat" while Nabbem handcuffs him. They deliver the hapless one up to justice, and get arrested themselves for quarreling over who made the capture.

ROTIFERS (Oct. 12).—Can you imagine how infinitisimal one tenth of a millimetre is? Can you imagine highly organized forms as minute as this? And yet, those forms, known as Rotifers, are gigantic when compared to the diatoms which surround them. A German naturalist of the 17th Century discovered Rotifers when the dust in his roof-gutter moistened in process of cleaning.

This naturalist made a profound study of the species. His discoveries, with those that have since been made, are interestingly and understandingly shown in this film. Not the least interesting feature of the film is that practically all but the introductory pictures were photographed under water.

CYNTHY (2 parts—Oct. 29).—Jed Barnes and Tom Sykes had grown up as young men together, had married two girl friends, and both had one child. Jed's child, Cynthy, lived, but her mother did not. Tom's child died. Things went from bad to worse with Jed in Seetson, so he decided to try his luck elsewhere, and left his motherless Cynthy with his friends the Sykeses. For a time he sent remittances regularly. When these ceased Cynthy's life was made an unbearable drudgery. Her one solace was Taffy, the dog. Sally Sykes hated animals as much as Cynthy loved them, so Taffy was an ever-present bone of contention. Cynthy had about made up her mind to run away when a strange thing happened.

Tom Sykes threw Cynthy his coat to mend. Cynthy found in it a letter from her father, enclosing $100,000, promising more, saying that he had struck it rich, and that he would repay the Sykeses royally for their loving care of his Cynthy. The subject of all this sat stupefied for a moment, and then was galvanized into action. That night a pathetic little figure made its escape towards the railroad station, dragging Taffy along. Cynthy was homeward bound.

At Camp Macleod, Jed Barnes was rejoicing over the appraisal of his newly discovered ore values, and at Cynthy's telegram announcing her coming. Jed gathered all the boys together, and then there began a merry tussel to see who'd get the best duds away from the others in honor of Cynthy. Cynthy arrived. The camp was stunned to see that Taffy had the better of her as to looks. Only the sheriff saw the good heart beneath the homely little face. His sister, Agatha, of the Blessed Virgin's Sacred Order, came at his summons to give Cynthy care and guidance.

Trouble developed at Camp Macleod. The "bad man" from the next county and a pal were seen slinking around suspiciously. When the sheriff challenged him, Cynthy interfered, saying he had been very kind to her on her trip West, and she would vouch for him. That settled it. The boys, whom Cynthy had organized into a class that met every Monday, loved the freckle-faced girl, but her heart was bound up in the "bad man."

When old Jed Barnes had his first shipment of gold ready to send East, the trouble came to boiling point. The "bad man," on the pretext of courting Cynthy, hid in the house and was caught by the girl in the act of stealing her father's gold. Cynthy's love died then and there, but the sound of approaching footsteps awakened her pity for the "bad man" and she hid him hurriedly. The sheriff entered. He realized the situation in a moment and caught his quarry. Cynthy tore his gun away by force, and emptied its cartridges into the fireplace. Before the sheriff could shout a warning, the cartridges exploded and tore a deep furrow clear across the "bad man's" back. He fell like a splintering log. Jed Barnes rushed in with the "bad man's" pal. The sheriff explained. Next day, after burying the outlaw, he returned to console Cynthy, whom he dearly loved. The girl turned away. Removing her few trinkets, she journeyed to the Convent. At the great gates, Sister Agatha came to receive her into the peace of the Great Silence.

SUCCESS WITH DE-FEET (Nov. 2).—The parts of principals and chorus in this comedy are played by feet. Trim Feet say goodbye to her husband, Stuttering Feet, and off the latter go for business bound. Stuttering Feet become unmanageable in passing Swing Doors! ! ! ! They enter shame-footedly and meander up to a Brass Rail and say "howdy" to Gay Feet, Shoddy Feet and Spat Feet. The liquidated hours pass light-footedly, with only one unpleasant incident—when the congenial Feet fall out over a lost bill-fold. Trim Feet waits and waits for Stuttering Feet, then she—or is it they?—go to sleep, ARMED WITH A ROLLING PIN! ! !

Stuttering Feet and the other friendly Feet find a Polished Floor and meet Dancing Feet and Naughty Feet. They trip the light fantastic in approved tango measure, but Stuttering Feet is having difficulty in his circumlocutions and is deserted by all the other Feet—or is it Foots? Club Feet comes along and throws Stuttering Feet out into the cold, cruel world. Stuttering Feet pussy-foots home. The Keyhole is of the revolving variety. Finally Stuttering Feet anchors it and enters his peaceful domicile. The furniture is moving! ! ! Several pieces knock him down! ! ! Trim Feet wake up. The Rolling Pin comes into action. Floors, ceilings, walls, and all hit poor Stuttering Feet, who goes down ingloriously to De-Feet.

ORGANISMS WHICH INHABIT STAGNANT WATERS (Nov. 2).—As orchids flourish best in slime, so may one find the most delicate forms of life indigenous to dark, stale-odoured pools and ponds that are never freshened by sunlight. ## A MESSAGE FROM MARS Featuring CHARLES HAWTREY

"MESSAGE FROM MARS" IN LOEW HOUSES

A new feature film of considerable importance in England has just been secured for his New York theatres by Marcus Loew.

It is Charles Hawtrey's highly successful comedy, "A Message From Mars," filmed with the renowned English comedian in his original role.

Contracts for the exclusive rights to this photo-play were signed by Mr. Loew this week. The picture production was made by the United Kingdom Films, Ltd., of London, and negotiations were closed for this concern by James McEnnery.

"A Message From Mars" will be on view at the Loew theatres within a very short time.—New York Review, Oct. 11, 1913.

WHAT THE NEW YORK SUN SAID, OCT. 10, 1913

And now, close on the heels of J. K. Hackett and Mrs. Fiske, it is Charles Hawtrey, the English comedian, who is to once more make an almost immediate reappearance on Broadway in spite of the fact that he is at present and is likely for months to come, to continue appearing in London in "Never Say Die." Yesterday Marcus Loew acquired from James McEnnery, Mr. Hawtrey's American representative, the New York State rights to the Hawtrey film production of "The Message From Mars," and it will be immediately presented at all the Loew theatres in this State. —ACTON DAVIES.

of water will soon breed these by the millions. This infinitesimal manifestation or life varies in size from one thousandth of a millimetre to three millimetres. Frail and minute as they are, the "Infusoria" are surrounded by even more delicate microbes and prey on these as a means of sustenance. In proportion, their strength is as deadly to their victims as is that of mankind to the lower animals.

THE BLACK MASKS (2 parts—Oct. 28).—At a big automobile race one of the winning drivers, Tony Jeanette, is given an invitation to a masked ball to take place that evening at the home of the wealthy Mrs. Montague. In haste, he drops the invitation, which is found by F J. Francis, a society crook, and also read by Meg, another gentile crook. Knowing of the wonderful necklace of Mrs. Montague, they both decide to attend the ball in an effort to steal same, unknown to each other.

At the ball Meg is seen masked, watching every chance to get the necklace, but Francis is more clever and gets away with it.

The diamond is missed. Two society detectives at the ball follow Francis' cab, which he jumps out of while going at high speed, leaving his cane inside the cab. Meg follows Francis unknown to anyone, and succeeds in getting into his apartments. Francis discovers her and shows her the diamonds, which she tries to get. After she has gone, he misses his watch, which she has cleverly taken to get even. In the meantime the detectives have gotten up with Francis' cab and discover it is empty, but find his cane with his monogram (F.J.H.) on. They find the jeweler who made the cane, and find from him the club to which Francis belongs. Going there they discover Francis, but are not sure of him, as they only saw him at the ball and he was masked. They ask for a light and cigarette, and see the same monogram on his ring and cigarette case, and arrest him as the thief. Meg hears of his arrest and attends his trial, when he is pronounced guilty. Going to his cell, she offers to help him if she can. He tells her where he has hidden them, and she goes to his apartment, gets the jewels from their hiding place in the waste basket, and stealing into Mrs. Montague's boudoir, places the jewels where she finds them later, and phones the police of their discovery. Francis is released. He and Meg marry and give up all of their ill-gotten gain to the society of the orphans. The last scene shows them looking at the bank balance of $10.00, but happy in their love and promise of a better life.

FROM DAWN TILL DARK (2 parts—Nov. 1).—In the water that glimmers in the foreground there is a shadow, then a ruffle on the clear surface and then a canoe creeps out containing a young trapper and his Indian helper. Arriving at the fort he learns of an expected Indian outbreak. Grace, the Colonel's daughter, has gone for a ride. The trapper follows and saves her from the pursuing Indians after her horse has been shot down from under her. This is one of the most cleverly arranged and spectacular pieces of business yet conceived for a Western picture.

The lieutenant, loving Grace himself, is anxious to have the trapper on his way. Failing in this, he pursuades him to take drugged whiskey. While the trapper lies in the guard house supposedly drunk the Indians attack. Here he is found by his Indian helper, and following the administration of some herbs, he regains himself. The attacking Indians press hard; the fort is set afire. The trapper escapes from the guard, kills several Indians and rides away for help.

In the meantime the lieutenant negotiates for a surrender. Grace appeals to the men to ignore the coward. The trapper arrives in time to save the day, but is mortally wounded in the fight that ensues. He is left in the open dying by the stream, while Grace waits in the fading twilight for his return.

JANE OF THE MOTH-EATEN FARM (Oct. 27).—Lawyer Raynforth, of the village of Meadowsweet, receives a letter from Australia, informing him that Jane, the village belle, and daughter of farmer Gall, has come into a legacy for sixty million dollars and thirty-five cents. This arouses the wicked lawyer's cupidity and he determines to win Jane for himself. He goes to her and demands her hand in marriage. Jane refuses and the lawyer expresses his determination to foreclose the mortgage he holds on their gramaphone. This vile threat frightens Jane, her father and mother. Rather than lose the gramaphone, Jane determines to marry the lawyer. She then gets a letter saying that her faithful sweetheart, the brave sailor, Jack Harrington, has left his ship and is on his way to join her. The lawyer drags her from the house to marry him. Their faithful servant, Soft Sammy, has stolen into the lawyer's office and substituted in the envelope the Australian letter for the mortgage. He meets the sailor and informs him of the wedding to take place. He and the sailor and the sailor's chauffeur arrive at the City Hall in time to frustrate the villain's plan. The villain, wild with rage, flourishes the mortgage envelope in Jane's face, when Soft Sammy asks the sailor to demand to see the mortgage. When the villain produces it he finds it is a letter from Australia announcing that Jane is an heiress. The sailor kicks the lawyer out. The lawyer determines to have revenge on the sailor. He hires two gunmen, who capture and bind the sailor, and carry him to the Old Mill, where the lawyer is waiting for them. They drag him inside to the torture chair. The faithful servant, Soft Sammy, follows, and when he finds that the sailor is in the hands of the villain, he rushes off to get aid, but, unfortunately, his foot gets caught in a bear trap. The gunmen bind the sailor with irons to the cellar floor, and branding irons are put into the furnace. A note is sent by the villain to Jane, in the sailor's name, telling her to come to the Old Mill at once. She does so, and to her horror finds her sweetheart in peril. The lawyer tells her that unless she consents to marry him he will brand the sailor's face with the hot irons. The sailor refuses to allow her to do so, and finally they brand him with the fatal letters C. O. D. In the meanwhile Soft Sammy has managed to get free and rushes to Jane's home. He tells her father and mother and their butler the news. They get a huge cannon and set off for the Old Mill. They arrive on the scene just in time. They blow down the door. The shot kills the two desperadoes; the sailor is released and falls into Jane's arms. The wicked lawyer is taken out, put against the wall and blown out of his clothes by the cannon.

HIS HOUR OF TRIUMPH (2 parts—Oct. 30).—Leonard Dare, America's most successful actor, has secured an option on "Pointed Foils," the latest Parisian success. In that the play deals with a timely subject, a treaty between the United States and Great Britain against the growth of Japan as a world's power. Dare predicts a big success for the play when it is produced. The play is put into active rehearsal, but to his disappointment, he cannot obtain a strong enough player to enact the part of "Philip Dawnay," an imporant member of the cast. After dismissing his company he returns home full of chagrin.

Derwent Hall, earning a miserable existence as a hack reporter on the "Planet," calls to interview Dare. Hall's wife is ill, the doctor has instructed him that unless she have proper food she will die. Hall takes the opportunity of urging Dare to read a play he has written or allow him to read it aloud. Spellbound, Dare listens to the most absurd rubbish he has ever heard, but is magnetized by the most magnificent acting that he has ever seen. When Hall finishes, Dare congratulates him with the thought that he has at last found the man to play the part of "Philip Dawnay" in his new play. To test still further Hall's power under strong emotional stress, Dare writes out a check for the play, which the man looks on calmly and then throws the manuscript into the fire. Hall goes into a rage, believing that his masterpiece has been ruined. Dare overpowers him and tells him that his play has brought fortune to him and that he is going to make him the greatest actor in the world. Money is given him to take home to his wife and also the part of "Philip Dawnay," with instructions to return to rehearsal. Hall gets fired from the paper for failure to get the interview.

When the report travels along Broadway that Dare is going to entrust the part to an unknown, everyone believes him crazy. While various members of the company and friends try to dissuade him the rehearsals continue Even the author of the play wires from Paris his protests. When the night of the opening arrives, Lemaitre, the author, is on hand to see it. Everyone is nervous and Hall is in a blue funk, fearful that he is not going to make good.

The play commences, and for the first few scenes Hall is treated with distinct coldness by the audience. The author is in despair until the big scene arrives, when Hall, as the young Englishman, is being fooled by the Countess Zuekella, who is seeking the treaty for the Japanese government. Hall, as Philip Dawnay, runs through the gamut of emotions, and then turns the tables on the plotters: the tension on the audience breaks and cheer after cheer rolls out as the curtain falls.

Unconscious of the sensation he has made, Hall returns to his dressing room feeling utterly wretched. In the meantime the audience clamor for him and Dare drags him from his dressing room to the front of the stage. Lemaitre rushes from his box and embraces him. It is at this moment that a message reaches him from home. In his hour of triumph his wife, who has been all the world to him, has died

WHEN SPIRITS WALK (Oct. 30).—Eloise Brandon rides over the hills to her chum's home, Margaret Dale, to inform her that brother Jack is coming home from college, that he will arrive that day and is bringing with him two college chums. As Margaret was very much in love with Eloise's brother, she readily consented to ride back with her to meet the boys. One of the boys falls in love with Jack's sister, much to the disgust of Eloise, as Willie was somewhat of a scrimp.

The following day they start out for the picnic grove and pass by a haunted house. Eloise explains to the boys that the house is haunted, and she notices that Willie is very nervous. The next time he proposes, which happens every two or three hours, she tells him that if he will spend the night in the haunted house she will consider his proposal. This almost stumps Willie, but he promises to do so, and in the early evening he bids Eloise a farewell and hikes for the haunted house. The girls and boys are watching him, and decide to follow with the intention of playing a few ghostly tricks.

Mrs. Murphy, the cook, is a somnambulist, and during her semi-conscious state she has been in the habit of visiting the haunted house. The peculiar happenings in the haunted house on this fateful occasion was such that it stirred up the village to a state of frenzy, the constable and his posse reaping some of the benefits after sharing in the fright. The two girls and the three boys land in jail and a hurry call is sent for father. He rushes to the sheriff's office, fines are paid and they then hike for the automobile, leaving Willie and Mrs. Murphy to walk home together.

HIS CONSCIENCE (Nov. 1).—Henry Marlin and Bob Lamar both love the same girl—Florence Morgan—but the latter being unable to decide, tells them she will marry the one who makes his fortune first. They finally agree. Bob decides to go to California as a ranchman, while Henry goes to Arizona in search of gold.

After a year we find Bob prospering beyond all expectations, while Henry is tugging away on dead dirt. A letter from Bob expresses great sympathy for Henry's poor luck and suggests that he (Henry) quit the dead mine and try his fortune in California. Henry accepts and wires Bob to look for him in a few days. Col. Waters, a wealthy ranchman, has been watching the progress of Bob and finally makes him an offer to buy his great herd. Bob asks a few days to think it over. The colonel calls again, when Bob accepts his offer. The deal is just being closed when Henry arrives, sees the good fortune backed by the hard cash in hand and immediately grows insanely jealous of Bob, knowing that his rival will now return home and win the hand of Florence. He promptly sets a plan to prevent it. Since the new owner will not take possession until the next day, Bob invites Henry to share his bedroom for the night. They retire.

Bob is fast asleep. Henry, restless from worry, is wide awake. In the moonlight he is seen to leave the bed, pause at the foot, then, going slowly around to Bob's side, stands gazing upon his rival. Unable to resist the temptation, he cautiously withdraws the roll of money from under Bob's pillow and is just about to turn away, when Bob awakens. Losing all control, Henry throws himself upon Bob and chokes him. Then gathering up the sheet, hurriedly makes a tourniquet about the latter's throat. Quickly he steals through a window and escapes. Completely exhausted from his terrible flight, Henry falls at the feet of a broken tree, where he is later found asleep, the money in his hand. In his dreams he sees himself reduced to ashes and sack cloth, but possessing the money stolen from his friend. Dying of thirst on a desert, he offers his money to Heaven for a drop of water, but in vain. Starving, he comes across a party, feasting upon the fat of the land, and offers his money for a bit of food, only to be repulsed for tendering blood money.

Even the girl that loved him accused him of being a thief and murderer. He awakens. Gazing upon the money in his grasp his conscience overcomes him, and falling upon his knees he prays to Heaven for the life of his friend. He rushes to the home of Bob just as the latter is about to breathe his last, replaces the stolen money and revives him. Bob never knew the truth, for his own words absolved Henry when he said: "I had a terrible dream. I thought somebody was choking me." When Bob, bidding the boys goodby, took Henry's hand and said "Here's my best friend. He'll make you a good foreman," it was indeed tough for Henry.

Time passes. Bob's wedding day arrives. Just as we see the crowd leaving the church, the familiar form of another appears at a window in the ranch house and gazes into the moonlight. Feeling the pangs of choking at his own throat, he falls to his knees in true repentance.

THE GAME THAT FAILED (Oct. 28).—Fred's mother-in-law on a lecture tour, visits them. Fred has a date at the club and looks for some way to get away from home and his mother-in-law. He feigns illness and mother makes him go to bed. He tries to sneak out but can't. He then starts screaming as if in agony, and mother gives him some pills. He vows that he is poisoned and she sends for a doctor. The medico pumps him out with a stomach pump and although evidently not poisoned, the treatment he received was enough to keep him in bed for quite a while. Mother, seeing her darling son-in-law suffering such agony, determines to give up her lecture tour and nurse Fred herself, thereby making his misery complete.

A HIDDEN LOVE (Nov. 2).—Alice is left an orphan. She is sent to George and his mother as their ward. She lives there and helps George prepare his sermons, George being a minister. An attachment springs up between the two but George allows his sentiments to ripen into love, while Alice looks upon him as her friend and mentor. She goes away to boarding school. There, after a course of study, she meets Richard Wilson, her history professor. They are thrown together constantly and learn to love each other. At the summer vacation, he visits her. George was preparing to tell her of his love, when Richard arrives and he sees the two in each other's arms. Realizing how happy the pair were, and seeing in Richard a worthy fellow, George buries his love and marries the pair.

HEARTS ENTANGLED (Oct. 19).—Kate's husband, Mike, is arrested, and sent to jail. She leaves town and goes West, getting a job as waitress in an old hostelry. Tom, in New York, courts pretty Alice Wilson. Her father informs Tom that he can only marry her when his earnings are more than three thousand dollars a year. Alice's sister, Leila, sympathizes with the young couple and offers her help. Tom receives a letter from his friend, Jim Parker, in the western town where Kate lives, offering Tom a partnership in his mine if he will come out and help him work it. Tom goes. He stops at Kate's hotel and she falls madly in love with him. He repulses her. Jim goes on a visit to the East and Tom gives him a letter of introduction to Alice and her folks. Jim visits them and pays attention to Leila and she becoming attached to him, they are married. The newspapers in printing an account of the wedding make an error and quote Alice as having married Jim instead of Leila. Alice writes Tom a letter, enclosing the newspaper clipping and informing Tom that the entire family were coming West with Jim and Leila. Kate, who has not progressed very well in her pursuit of Tom, gets hold of Alice's letter to Tom, and seeing it addressed in a woman's handwriting, her jealousy prompts her to open it. She guesses at the truth and tears up the letter. When Tom returns to the hotel, she shows him the newspaper with the account of Jim's marriage to Alice, his sweetheart. He waxes glum and morose, and yields to Kate's pleadings that he marry her. He consents and they are married. Later, Alice, together with Jim and his bride, arrive in town, and Tom refuses to speak to Alice, thinking her Jim's wife. Kate, after all is explained to Tom, and he shows inclinations to be sorry for his hasty act in marrying her, refuses to waive her claim to him, and Tom seems doomed to live a life of misery with her, when an old bedraggled miner strays into camp. He proves to be Mike, Kate's first husband, from whom she had never been divorced. He claims her as his wife and his claim being established, Tom's marriage to her is declared illegal and is free to resume where he left off with Alice, the only girl he ever really could love.

Three "ALIVE" reels of American cowboys and "cowbells" competing for the World's championship in death defying dangers seen nowhere else on the face of the earth.

The wildest horses are ridden merely to test the strength of the proud cowboy in subduing the vicious, bucking and biting, man-killers.

Cowboys wrestle wild steers to prove that, with their bare hands, they can throw the mad animals to the ground. No ordinary person could attempt such feats and escape with his life. You actually see man, horse and steer clash to the ground together, seldom escaping without serious injury.

The public is hungry for something "ALIVE." "They eat it up" and you state right men know it. Grasp your opportunity NOW and get this "ALIVE" feature better than a special.

PLAYMATES (Oct. 27).—Little Dorothy's parents are rich, but the child is very lonesome. Rosa, a tiny Italian tot, goes with her father, who carries an organ. She gets variety, but would like to play a while, too. The organ grinder comes to the gate of the residence of Dorothy's father and plays, and little Dorothy is attracted to the gate. A wistful little face looks through the gate at the flowers and Dorothy gives her some, and they are soon chatting joyfully.

Rosa comes often and one day nurse, ordering the child to stay inside and play, goes for a short auto ride with the chauffeur. The organ grinder comes, and Rosa asks her father if she may play with Dorothy, who has stolen out of the gate. The children play in the garden, and Rosa says, "Let's go to my home now and play mud pies." They run off and have a fine time and play with water and mud, and are found by the anxious organ grinder later when Dorothy is taken home to her parents, who are looking for her.

Later on Dorothy falls sick, and continually calls for her playmate. At last Rosa and her father come and play at the gate, and Dorothy hears them and begs for Rosa. The child is brought, and after kissing Rosa, the spirit of the poor little rich girl goes to her Maker. Rosa goes away puzzled by sorrow.

As she passes the gardener she asks him why he plants the seed. He tells her, "When a pretty flower dies, it leaves a seed, and God lets it grow again." Rosa gets home and thinks it out, and being lonesome, decides to plant her dolly, so that it may grow to be a nice playmate for her. She does this and one night, believing it to be lonesome too, goes and sits by the grave of her precious doll. The rain comes down and the night passes into the faint streaks of the rosy morning, when the spirit of Dorothy comes and smiles on the little Italian girl, and raising her, she leads her off to the place where one never suffers.

REX.

THE CLUE (Oct. 30).—A wealthy banker, Peter Oakley, is giving a reception. The guests are exclusive people of leisure, and among them are Philip Smallen, an amateur detective, and Julian, an old friend of the hostess. Dr. Brandt arrives. While waiting for the banker he lays down his medical case. The guests are curious and they look through the case and examine a hyperdermic needle and a phial of poison, a drop of which, the doctor explains, is sufficient to kill ten men.

The banker holds Brandt's note, which is already mature. Brandt insists that the banker give him more time on the note and the banker refuses. The two men seat themselves before a pair of portieres; the banker produces a threatening letter sent to him by Brandt. They quarrel. From the rear a hand is seen to cut a rent in the portier. This hand then feels the position of the banker's arm. It withdraws; the hand reappears, holding a hyperdermic syringe. The needle is forced into the banker's arm, the poison is potent and the banker dies, after a few gasps. All in confusion until Smalley takes temporary charge of the case. He soon ascertains that the banker was murdered. He finds a broken bit of hyperdermic needle in the dead man's arm, and upon one of his cuffs links, a thumb print, bearing a "V"-shaped scar.

The police are summoned by Julian. Upon the floor near the spot of the murder is found a threatening letter from Brandt to the banker. Every clue points to the fact that Brandt is the murderer and the doctor is overcome with terror of the situation. The police arrive, and Smalley turns over to the lieutenant of police all the clues which he has collected. The lieutenant hastily concludes that Brandt is guilty, especially as an unintentional eavesdropper testifies that she heard the two men quarreling violently. As the lieutenant is about to lead Brandt off Smalley suggests that the case pend a few moments while he make further investigations. Smalley sits in the chair, a moment before occupied by the dead man. He rehearses the moment preceding the murder. His eye finds the rent in the portier. Behind the portier he finds a hyperdermic syringe with a broken needle and a ladies' handkerchief. All ladies in the room disclaim ownership. By its rare perfume he concludes that it belongs to the hostess. He presents it to her and she faints. Julian is very much concerned. Smalley takes up Julian's cigarette case which lays upon the table. On it's polished surface he finds the thumb spring bearing a "V"-shaped scar. Smalley places the hyperdermic syringe in the cigarette case and leaves it on the table. Julian takes it up, opens it, and Smalley sees on his face that he is the culprit. Julian strolls to the door, when he is confronted by a policeman. He returns to the center of the room and in a glance between himself and Smalley he understands that the game is up. From his pocket he takes a small bundle of letters and hands them to his hostess. The lieutenant places his hand upon Julian's shoulder and arrests him. With a rapid movement Julian uses the remaining poison in the syringe to make his own quietus. He jabs the needle into his arm and dies as quickly as the banker. The letters that he gave the banker's wife were love letters and they show that it was at her suggestion that the husband be put out of the way to the end that they might [illegible] their freedom.

JEWELS OF SACRIFICE (Nov. 2).—The mother [illegible] her jewels as the nurse sits with her [illegible]. The [illegible] is alarmed at the child's symptoms, and calls the mother. A doctor is called in haste, and gives it as his opinion, that the child cannot live. The broken-hearted mother goes to the shrine in her home and makes a vow that if her babe is spared, she will sacrifice her precious jewels at the shrine of the adored Saint. The vision of the Saint in shining raiment appears and tells the mother to return to her child, and she finds it is on the road to recovery.

Donning the garb of pilgrimage, the mother starts upon her journey and comes across a man with bowed head; he tells her that his little boy cannot recover the use of his legs unless he is treated by a great surgeon, and the mother parts with some of her jewels and goes on her way. She meets two ruffians carrying off a girl to bondage; she stays them and parts with more of her beloved jewels, and takes the girl home to her frantic mother. Again she passes on and crosses the path of two old people, who have been turned from their home, unable to meet their rent. She takes them to the hard-hearted landlord and parts with the remainder of her precious stones.

Arriving at the shine she humbles herself and tells the good Saint that the only jewel she has left is her true heart. The Saint appears to her with outstretched arms and a vision of the people she has saved intercedes silently for her. They fade into memories and the Saint comes to the woman who risked her vow and tells her that no "Jewels of Sacrifice are greater than good deeds," and bids her home—satisfied.

BEAUTY IN THE SEASHELL (Oct. 14).—Whenever the clerk heard his chums tell of the joys of the seashore, he smiled mysteriously, knowing that none of them could match his experiences. His fiancée was at Cape May, and there he went to spend a few days. The very first morning she went to see her dressmaker and remained so long that in pity she told him to go to the beach and enjoy himself until she arrived. Some time later she appeared, and was shocked to find him in the embrace of a beautiful young woman, a stranger to her. His explanation that she had "come out of a seashell," seemed to lack plausibility, but he insisted that it was true. Later, the young woman's conduct proved the truth of the strange story, and the girl and her sweetheart had all kinds of adventures in trying to escape her.

She followed them when they went in bathing, she was on hand when they went sailing and fishing, the young man was helpless, and did not have any idea how matters could be remedied. Fortunately, he had a resourceful woman in the girl of his choice and she found a way to dispose of the unwelcome stranger, who, despite her youthful appearance, boasted that she was more than 1000 years old, and was hardly the kind of a woman that a matter-of-fact young clerk would choose for his bride.

THE MYSTERY OF THE HAUNTED HOTEL (Oct. 21).—At the seashore resort they called it "the haunted hotel," and explained that since the death of the proprietor's wife, who was drowned at sea, her spirit had walked the sands each night. True or false, the story had ruined the place and for years it had been closed and was fast falling to ruins. The proprietor lived there with his daughter, but he was practically bankrupt, and it was whispered that he would soon be turned out for non-payment of his taxes.

A young physician came to the resort to visit his sister, and hearing of the haunted hotel, decided, out of curiosity, to investigate. He was greatly taken with the broken down owner, and listened with sympathy to his story of misfortune. When the doctor came away, he vowed that he would devote part of his time seeking to solve the mystery of the haunted hotel, and by good luck he succeeded in doing so.

The "ghost" was unmasked, but she was not punished. The innkeeper's daughter was the "spirit," and her mind had been unhinged by grief because of the death of the mother she dearly loved. The doctor succeeded in restoring her to health, and the hotel, the curse removed, soon regained the popularity of the summer visitors, who had shunned it when it was a "haunted hotel."

THE OLD FOLKS AT HOME (Oct. 24).—The old boatman and his wife were thoroughly happy, although they were not even well off. One day a young man dropped around with a kodak, and induced them to let him take a snapshot. It turned out well and the couple were proud of it, and sent it by the first mail to their son, a wealthy broker in the city. The younger man's heart reproached him when he saw it, and he decided that it was a shame to leave his parents in such poverty, so he persuaded them, much against their will, to leave with him. They were treated kindly, but the habits of many years were almost impossible to overcome and they made a break for liberty, explaining that they would far rather work than be stylish. The old couple bought back their boat business and are happy as the day is long. The broker's wife sometimes visits them, and in public is fond of boasting of her husband's people, whom she describes as "belonging to one of our oldest families, and who live on their estate near the seashore."

IN THE DAYS OF TRAJAN (2 parts—Oct. 27).—In the year 101 A.D. Trajanus was emperor of Rome. He was one of the great emperors of that period, and one of the great works by which he beautified Rome is known as the Column of Trajan. The emperor had prepared a "Triumph," as the ceremony was known in those days, and the victims of his conquest were marched in Rome to the forum. Among them is seen Decebalus, Prince of Dacia, and his mother, the Queen of Dacia. The Emperor promises the Prince his freedom if he will swear allegiance to Rome. He hesitates, but the Queen says: "In Dacia we are royal and shall not be vassals to Rome." The Emperor is angered and sends them to the dungeons of the Circus Maximus to await their fate in the arena. The arena is prepared, the Emperor is in the imperial box and all is ready for the conflict of the gladiators. At last Decebalus is told he must go to the arena and fight. He asks: "With whom?" A Dacian is pointed out to him. He says: "Why, he is of Dacia, and therefore my brother."

Notwithstanding, he is forced out and we see them in the arena before the imperial box saluting the Emperor. They fight and the Dacian is thrown to the ground in the battle. Decebalus does not wound him, and when he appeals to the Emperor and the court for their decision, the Emperor shows by the word "Habet" and the downward turning of the thumb that death is his portion. Decebalus raises his sword as if to kill, but with the other hand extended to the Dacian, they leap from the arena into the imperial box and are about to kill Trajan, but Decebalus is made prisoner by the centurions in attendance on the Emperor. Trajan and his court leave the Circus Maximus and Decebalus is again taken to his dungeon to await sure death for his assault on the Emperor. He again escapes and is brought before the Emperor just as the word is brought that the Huns have invaded Rome. Decebalus volunteers to fight the invaders and is victorious. When offered a reward he demands his mother's freedom, which is granted. Trajan also gives him Octavia to wed and restores him to his own country.

IN THREE HOURS (Oct. 30).—Bessie Ames, daughter of a ranch owner, is beloved by Spencer, the foreman, and Jim Wallace, one of her father's cowboys. She favors Jim, but her father is set on her marrying the foreman, until Jim brings him proof of the other's dishonesty. Spencer is dismissed and Jim gets the position and the girl of his choice. But, in revenge, Spencer lures Jim to a trysting place of the lovers, ties him to a tree and sets a keg of powder at his feet, placing a lighted candle in it timed to go off in three hours.

He then returns to the ranch and meets Bessie; he insolently tells her what he has done. She manages to elude him and dashes away alone on horseback. Spencer goes after her, however, and overtaking her before she has gone far, forces her to return. They reach the house just as the time limit is expired. He points triumphantly at the clock and goes off, while Bess falls fainting to the floor. On the return of her father he is told the terrible tale. Gathering his men together, they set off headed by Bessie and reach the fatal spot, only to find that by a direct act of providence, Jim has been saved.

FOLLIES OF A DAY AND NIGHT (Nov. 1).—Mr. E. Z. Smithers is very unhappily married. He asks his wife if she would get a divorce should he be sent to jail and she replies most emphatically that she would. He saunters down the street, gets into a scrap with a tough looking character and both are arrested. The other fellow proves to be a crook for whom a reward of $50 is offered. This is given to Smithers and he is released. After several futile attempts to get arrested he starts out to force himself into the jail, but all in vain and when finally he is put in a cell over night he receives a consoling note from his wife to the effect that his beloved mother-in-law will spend six months at his home.

PRINCESS.

LOBSTER SALAD AND MILK (Oct. 24).—The little girl made free with her elder sister's rouge, perfume and powder, and was punished by being sent to bed without any supper. This had little effect on the child. As soon as the house was quiet she wandered down to the ice box and had an excellent snack consisting of lobster salad and milk, then she returned to bed and prepared to sleep the sleep of the just. Somehow she had a frightful dream. She could never explain it afterwards. The family doctor when he heard about the lobster salad and milk shook his head wisely and said that science could solve all things. She woke up finally, but was mighty glad to do so, and readily promised that in the future she would keep away from her sister's bureau and the family icebox, so that in the future she might not have such thrilling experiences.

MAJESTIC.

THROUGH THE SLUICE GATES (Oct. 19).—John Browning, a young farmer, left his home because he could not stand the petty persecutions of his stepfather and his son, who were alike in their grasping and [illegible] characteristics. Some months after he had moved to the city he received word that his mother had died, and when he returned home he found that everything had been left to the stepfather. John had good reasons to suspect trickery and openly charged his stepfather with it, but could prove nothing.

The villagers all agreed that there was bad blood between young Browning and his stepfather, and predicted there might be serious effects, but when John was arrested and charged with the murder of Gray, his stepfather, it was considerably more than they had bargained for. Gray had been found dead in his home, while John had stood nearby with a rifle in his hands. He was placed in prison to wait trial.

The circumstantial evidence seemed so conclusive that Mary, John's sweetheart, persuaded him to escape. John and the girl mounted horses which had been in waiting and rode away. The escape was discovered almost immediately and a posse which included the brother, was organized and started in pursuit. The fugitives soon found that they were being overhauled and capture would have been certain if the girl's quick wit had not thought of a way to liberty. She guided Browning to a nearby culvert, and he descended into the tunnel, making his way to the sluice gates a mile away. The pursuers seeking the girl ride away alone, were at first baffled, then realized the trick and rode at full speed towards the hills. But before they reached their goal the girl had opened the sluice gates and released her sweetheart. They were well on the road to safety when the posse arrived. Half mad with hatred and disappointment, George Gray, the stepbrother, leaped over the cliff and leveled his revolver at the fugitive. But before he could fire, his foot slipped and his body hurled to the road a hundred feet below. Browning hastened to his assistance, but Gray had received mortal injuries. Before he died he confessed that he had accidentally caused his father's death and had decided to let John bear the responsibility. John's right to his mother's property was also admitted by the dying man, and cleared in the eyes of the law, Browning returned to his home to prepare it for the coming of his bride.

ALWAYS TOGETHER (Oct. 21).—He was a day laborer, and generally regarded as a good shoveler, although not a fancy shoveler. His wages were $1.25 a day, but he was happy because he had a beautiful daughter, an old foul-smelling pipe and a goat. One day fortune came to him unexpectedly, and he gave up his work, trying to be happy while his daughter was making an attack upon the fortress of society. The poor girl had a hard time, because her father insisted upon keeping the goat, and the animal was not at his ease during social functions. For a time father, by having his goat, got his daughter's figurative goat, and the happy family was on the verge of disruption. The old man may have been a joke at afternoon teas, but he was diplomatic in his way, and won the girl over by reminding her of her childhood days. So she yielded to the inevitable, and the goat climbed the social ladder with them.

VENGEANCE (Oct. 25).—Parker and Baldwin both love Grace Summerfield. Grace prefers Baldwin and dismisses Parker after he has insulted her. Parker vows vengeance.

Enlisting the services of four tough characters, he succeeds, by a ruse, in luring Grace into the cellar of an old house, where they chloroform her and prepare to seal her up in the chimney. They know nothing of masonry, however, and set forth to procure the services of a bricklayer, who reluctantly does the task, but tells a policeman when he gets away. Meantime, Baldwin, alarmed at Grace's protracted absence, goes to the police station to notify the police. His story fits in with that of the bricklayer, and together they start out to find a clue. They go first to the half-finished building where the bricklayer was kidnapped. They follow the trail to the old house. They break in and the bricklayer recognizes the cellar and the girl is saved. Further pursuit of the trail leads the officers and Baldwin to the private room where Parker is paying his aids. They are seized by the police after a struggle and carried off. Baldwin and Grace are reunited.

RELIANCE.

THE HEART OF A ROSE (Oct. 22).—Jack Horton is engaged to a pretty girl, Editha, but despite this fact he neglects her for the companionship of a dissolute, Bohemian crowd. At last she sends him a note of protest, to which he replies with a brutal letter stating that if she wishes to break the engagement she may do so. When her father sees this note he demands that she give him up, but she says she would rather die. As Jack is lying in bed one morning after a night of dissipation, he receives a note from Editha enclosing a white rose, and telling him that he will find a drop of blood from her dying heart in the depths of the flower. He rushes to her home to learn that she has made an attempt on her life and is in the hospital in a dying condition. He arrives at the hospital and there vows that if her life is spared he will end his evil ways. The doctor assures him that the girl will live.

HEARTS (2 parts—Oct. 25).—Will had a natural aptitude for painting. So it was decided that he should go to Europe to study. Nora, his sister, was not so fortunate.

Bert, the pampered son of a wealthy and aristocratic old mother, came to the country for a few weeks' vacation. As he stepped off the train he bumped into Will. Bert wasn't in a good humor, so he made some remark about "Country Pumpkins" which Will resented. Bert raised his hand to strike, but it was caught in a firm grasp. The quarrel might have ended differently if Will had not had to run for the train. Then Bert went to the village hotel. He soon became the favorite of the girls and was promptly hated by the men. One night, at a husking bee, he met Nora Hampton. It wasn't long before they were married at the village parsonage and then took the train for New York. Not until he introduced Nora to his mother did he realize that he had made a mistake in marrying so hastily. Mrs. Norville, his mother, did not hesitate to tell Bert that he had made a fool of himself for marrying beneath him. Nora determined to fit herself to occupy the proud position of Bert's wife. She set to work to learn the accomplishments, especially the piano, but her progress was slow. Finally they all went to England. There they tried to polish Nora, but it seemed hopeless, much to Bert's and his mother's dismay. Nora received a letter from her brother, Will, who was in Paris, telling her he was coming to England to see her. She didn't want him to know she was unhappy, so she met him down the roadway. Will surmised that something was amiss, so they parted for the present with the understanding that she would see him again. Then she went back home but did not know the mischief she had done herself. Mrs. Norville had seen Nora and Will talking and accused Nora of having a lover. This so angered Nora that she refused to explain. Mrs. Norville told Bert of the incident. He loved Nora, but instead of asking her for an explanation, he ignored her. She received a note from her brother the next day, asking her to meet him; it began, "My dear Nora," and was signed, "Your loving Will." This note fell into Bert's hands. Nora was accused of having a lover. She was shunned, crushed. That night, humiliated, and heart-broken, she packed a few necessary things and went away. Next morning at breakfast Bert was handed a note from his wife, telling him that she had gone with her brother, the man he supposed to be her lover. Not until then did Bert realize how much he loved her and the injustice he had done her. Will took Nora back to Paris with him. He was winning fame and fortune. As for Nora, she changed in many ways. She learned to wear clothes like a Parisian, also to be a finished musician and a singer. At the end of five years she was one of the most accomplished women in Europe. One day, while she was away, Bert walked into the studio. He had aged considerably. He wanted a large portrait painted from a picture in a locket. It was Nora. Will knew that his sister's husband stood before him. He took the miniature and told him when to call again. When Nora returned home again he questioned her and learned how her heart was still true to her first love. When Bert next called Nora was singing and playing in another room. A startled, eager look came over his face, but died away into hopelessness. Will uncovered the painting which stood near the doorway of the inner room and Bert praised it. The haunting tones of the singer in the next room filled him with memories. The song died away and when he raised his head Nora was standing in the doorway. They stood looking long at each other. Neither spoke. Will quietly withdrew and closed the door behind him.

BORROWED GOLD (Oct. 31).—Jim Colby, a young miner, and his wife Ruth are living in the mountains near a small town in a mining district. Colby is injured by an explosion while working his claim. When he fails to return that night his wife becomes alarmed and, taking a lantern, rides over to the claim and finds Jim seriously injured. She manages to get him home and calls the doctor, who treats Jim for some time. When the bill becomes large the doctor refuses to go to Jim. Ruth becomes desperate and holds up the stage, disguised as a man. She is wounded in the arm. While bandaging her arm, she discards a duster, which she leaves behind her in her hurry to get away. The sheriff trails her to her cabin and she is surprised to find Jim, who the sheriff is sure has committed the robbery, a very sick man, and the girl busy counting the spoils. He grabs her by the arm, to find that she is wounded and that the wounded arm is the same as the bloody sleeve of the duster. Ruth confesses and tells the sheriff her story. She wins his sympathy and when his posse arrive at the cabin, he tells them that Jim was the man who did the job and that he is dead. The sheriff shows the posse the recovered money, and the picture closes with Ruth sobbing over the dead body of her husband.

WIDOW MALONEY'S FAITH (2 parts—Oct. 30).—Widow Maloney lives with her son Dan who is her idol. He is in love with Mary O'Connor, as is also Mike Dooley. Mike's father owns a fleet of whalers and Mike gives a dance at Sailors' Home, to which Dan and Mary are invited. His plan to pick a fight with Dan at the dance meets with disappointment for Mike Dooley and his friends, as Dan comes out victorious. Mike then bribes Dougherty, the saloonkeeper, to put chloral in Dan's whiskey and he and his friends shanghai Dan on one of the whalers which belong to Mike's father. The widow does not miss Dan, as she advised him after the fight to leave the country until the Dooleys cooled off. The whaler is wrecked and Dan is cast on a desert island, where he finds a large lump of ambergris. He is finally rescued by a passing ship. To obtain money he sells the ambergris to a firm of perfumers and receives a large sum. In the meantime the Dooleys demand the rent from Widow Maloney, and she not being able to pay, there is an auction. Dan arrives home in time to buy, through a lawyer, his mother's goods at the auction. One night Dan and his sailor friends seize Dooley and Dougherty and shanghai them on a boat which Dan has bought. Dan now makes himself known to his mother and Mary O'Connor.

TINY TIM KIDNAPS A BABY (Oct. 30).—Tiny Tim's latest escapade, though ending happily, for a while troubled two happy parents and subjected a baby to rough handling. Madame Lillie is the proud mother of a dear little girl of six months. Neither the mother nor the father can do too much to brighten its life, and the nurse is as anxious as they are to deck its path with roses. While in this mood they hear Tiny Tim singing in the street.

So plaintively does he warble that he touches the hearers' hearts, and he is invited into the house to sing to the baby. Smitten by her charms he tries his very best, and leaves loaded with acceptable presents. Such an impression has been made upon his susceptible heart, that he returns the following day to see the baby. Julie, the nurse, does not view his visit with favor, and hustles him out. With a wry face he goes. Suddenly a daring idea seizes him, he determines to carry off the baby; stealthily he walks through the rooms until he reaches the nursery. He pops the baby in a sack and makes off at full speed. Nor does he stop until he feels he is safe from pursuit, and, with the child still in the sack, lies down and goes to sleep. Julie, meanwhile, has been assisting in the packing of the luggage, as the family is off on a holiday. Then she goes for the baby, making the astonishing discovery that she has disappeared.

The distracted parents send for the police, and Inspector Richardson arrives with his trained dog, Mick. The sagacious animal is given a garment to get the scent, and realizes at once what is required of him. Even before the parents have finished their explanation, Mick is out of the house and pelting away in the track of Tiny Tim. He finds the missing pair, and concluding that the baby is in the sack, seizes it in his mouth and rushes back. Within a few minutes of his departure the dog places the sack at the feet of the Inspector. The baby is found to be none the worse for its strange and unexpected outing. The dog, however, concludes that his task is not finished, and, returning to the spot where Tiny Tim is asleep, unceremoniously drags the culprit to the house. Tiny Tim is forgiven.

WHEN A MAN'S MARRIED (Oct. 24).—Simpson endeavors to get rid of his mother-in-law. He arranges with a party of his friends to attack the old lady. The attack goes off very well, but one of the party foolishly drops a letter in which Simpson gives him his instructions. This leads Simpson's wife to divorce him. However, she loves her hubby more than she does her mother and all things end happily.

TERRIBLE BOBBY (Oct. 24).—A hurricane of mischievous tricks of which Bobby is the author. A whirlwind of laughter.

FEATURES

AMBROSIO.

CHOPIN'S NOCTURNE (Feature—2 parts—Oct. 11).—Count Henri de la Tour lives happily in his castle with his wife, Sylvia, and their adored little son, Alfred. The count is seeking the freedom of his country, which at the time of this story was under the domination of Austria. While in consultation with some friends they are taken by surprise by the head of the police, Malavolta, and the count is successful in escaping the soldiers by taking refuge in a forest.

Before leaving forever his country, an ardent desire sends him near his home for a last farewell to his wife and child. By means of a little shepherd lad named Jack, he dispatches a note to Sylvia advising her that he would be in hiding in the park, and that during the night, when she sees that all is quiet and the police who were pursuing him had left the house for their quarters, she should play Chopin's Nocturne on the piano, which would be a signal that he could come to the castle.

Unfortunately, on his way to deliver the note, Jack meets Sprangone, a miserly farmer, who is in an inn discussing with some friends the proclamation of the police, who promise a reward of $1,000.00 to whoever would give exact information regarding the count's whereabouts. Sprangone reads the note and then sends Jack on his way. Excusing himself from his companions the miser immediately takes himself to the police headquarters and advises Malavolta of what he has learned.

The night at length arrives and Sylvia, having satisfied herself that all is in safety for the arrival of her husband, is seated near the piano, when she is surprised by a visit from Malavolta. Having cunningly cross-examined her, he seats himself at the piano, and with a venemous smile on his face, commences to play Chopin's Nocturne. Carefully he watches the Countess Sylvia as she stands beside him, faint with fear for her husband's safety.

The count, hearing the long waited for melody, carefully comes out of his hiding place, and, with stealthy steps, makes for the castle. Sylvia, in the meantime, unseen by Malavolta, dispatches her little son, Alfred, to search for his father and warn him of the danger. He meets him, and together they are leaving the park when a pistol shot strikes little Alfred. Malavolta having vainly waited for the count's appearance, and fearing something was brewing, had given the alarm to his soldiers guarding the castle, and they go out in search of him. The little fellow, however, bravely bears his pains and manages to escape with his father. Not finding any trace of the refugee the soldiers give up the search and leave the grounds, thus giving the count and his brave little son a chance to join Sylvia.

TRUE FEATURES.

THE WITCH (Feature Subject—3 parts).—Florian, a traveling minstrel, is journeying along the highway with his gypsy-like troupe of men and women, when they see moving toward them a strange and terrified procession. They are leading a "witch" to the stake to be burned. Everything is made ready for the execution, the fagots await the touch of the match and the strong armed executioner seizes the girl and makes her fast to the stake. An old law is proclaimed before the execution is begun. According to this law, if any freeman comes forward from among the spectators and marries the "witch" she will be purged from her sin, but the law goes on to say that if she repays her benefactor husband with ingratitude, then the old judgment of death shall be revived and she shall forthwith be led to her death. Florian is touched with love and pity and marries the "witch." Her husband instructs her in the art of playing the lute, and one day as they play before the castle of one of the Dukes of the realm, the Duke falls in love with her. The "witch" resists the advances of the Duke. In the meantime the jealousy and rage of Fascha, who regarded Florian as her sweetheart, causes the arrest of Florian on the false charge of arson. Florian is brought before the court and condemned to life imprisonment, a punishment which the Duke alone has the power to remit. The Duke, who has been a party to this false accusation in order to gain possession of the "witch," promises to pardon Florian if his wife will kiss him. Florian, who sees his wife kissing the Duke, believes that she has been faithless to him. Florian appeals to the law and demands that sentence of death be carried out against his supposedly unfaithful wife. At this moment, the Duke hears the voice of Conscience and touched by the fidelity of the "witch," he proves her innocence and then pardons Florian, who is happily restored to his wife.

UNION FEATURES.

THE INGRATE, or THE VEIL OF THE PAST (Feature Subject—3 parts).—Robert Sartan found himself "down and out." Having heard of the generosity of Verdier, a banker, he caught at the idea as a last straw, and was fortunate enough to secure an interview. Mr. Verdier gave of sympathy and money freely to aid the unfortunate. Sartan was introduced into the Verdier home, and met Helen, the young daughter, who was, however, betrothed. Sartan pondered. His extravagant tastes required money constantly. As Helen and her dower were out of the question, he proceeded to commit a theft of valuables from Verdier's private safe. The safe was guarded. As he opened an inner receptacle, iron hands seized his, macerating them cruelly. His cries brought the horrified Verdier, who—always good at heart—bound up the ingrate's wounds.

Sartan pleaded so feelingly for another chance that Verdier gave it, first exacting Sartan's signature to a confession of attempted theft. Sartan could no longer work. He thought only and always of that paper incriminating him. Having observed the mechanism of the safe, he again sought its recesses to recover the paper, and succeeded. Also, he found an unbelievable document accusing Verdier of having committed a theft and served sentence for it twenty years before. With this in his possession, Sartan turned the tables easily, and demanded Helen in marriage, on pain of making public Verdier's past.

Seeing no way out of his difficulty, the banker resigned himself to the sacrifice of his daughter, who he knew disliked and distrusted Sartan. The thought goaded him constantly. Josette, an actress whom he had befriended and now came to repay her debt, forced him to confess his dilemma. Then she begged the privilege of a trusted friend to attempt to settle the matter her own way. Being unable to help himself, Verdier gladly clutched at this frail hope.

Accordingly, Josette contrived to fascinate Sartan while both were dining in a public restaurant. In the course of a few days, matters had progressed so well that they were dining privately. During the dinner, she created a diversion, and returned with cigars containing a narcotic. Sartan smoked one, and slept. Josette had him transported into a chamber of the hotel which was draped in black. A score of masked, powerful-looking men greeted the bewildered ingrate's eye when he revived. At the sight of a noose, he gladly gave up the Verdier document and again signed a confession of his guilt. Then, again in a stupor, he was carried back to the dining room. On reviving, he apologized to Josette for having dozed in her presence, and explained that he had had a fearful nightmare. Josette did not enlighten him. Needless to say, Verdier was overjoyed at Josette's good work. Sartan, on the eighth day, found the tables re-turned, and vanished in short order, to take up again his precarious life as a soldier of fortune.

The following is an extract from the Portland Press of the 9th inst. Same gave a detailed description of the New Empire Theatre in that city.

> You notice something peculiar about the screen. It is a GOLD FIBRE one, made by The American Theater Curtain & Supply Co., of Saint Louis, and permits an almost complete illumination of the theater day or evening and yet the pictures stand out as clearly defined as on the usual screen which requires a dark house. That explains your wonder at the house being lighted up so well.

ANNOUNCEMENT

We are now printing the word "Eastman" on the margin of all our Cine film. We want the exhibitor to know when he is and when he is not getting Eastman film. It will be to his advantage—and ours.

Of course it will take time for such identifiable films to reach the consumer—so don't expect results at once—but it's a step in the right direction—for your interests and ours.

SYSTEM
If you are not putting system in your business now, you never will. Five years ago I discovered that 60% of Exhibitors had no auditing system, much less bookkeeping records. That prompted me to publish
The Theatre Record Ledger System —
now that 60% are using a SYSTEM whereby they KNOW at the end of each week every cent received—what became of each ticket where the money went in expenses—separating every single item (9 in all). Even recording the weather, besides films and vaudeville.
I WILL DO THE SAME FOR YOU
Send me $2.50 (plus 20 cents postage), and I will mail you a THEATER RECORD LEDGER SYSTEM, with the understanding that if my SYSTEM is not far superior to the one you are now using your money will be refunded.

"LOOK AROUND TO YOUR HEART'S CONTENT"—

MIRROROIDE

PATENTS PENDING

Universally conceded the world's best. Is the screen you will eventually buy—nothing on earth can win you away from the simple truth! The evidence of your own eyes! Our five-year guarantee! The five thousand MIRROROIDE users—all MIRROROIDE boosters. We don't indulge in braggadocio—we are only too glad to show you facts by sending you postpaid large free samples. Test against any screen in your town.

MIRROROIDE

is now made in three different shades—silver white, silver flesh, amber (pale gold, two grades, A and B); same quality of cloth; same quality of metalized glass finish.

Our B grade is the only screen that will give perfect pictures close up or at an angle view. This is the grade used in the largest theatres the world over. A grade is the standard for theatres under 30 feet in width. The simple truth is disparaging to our competitors. They know, as all MIRROROIDE users know, MIRROROIDE is sold strictly on merit, backed up by plain truth.

THE QUESTION OF PRICE

MIRROROIDE is in a price division all by itself—due to proper factory facilities, efficient employees, ample capital, massive coating machines and made by men who know.

Our factory is five stories in height. Output 4,000 square yards of MIRROROIDE weekly. Floor space 13,500 square feet. Some plant, but it's devoted absolutely to

MIRROROIDE

Do you know our plant is running day and night? Do you know that last week's shipments alone consisted of 92 screens, 12 of which were over 18 x 22? Do you know that we shipped 9 screens to Philadelphia, Pa., 11 to Pittsburgh, Pa., 7 to New York City Borough, 8 to Toledo, Ohio? All in one week—this is simple truth.

OUR NEW METHOD OF HANGING

(Patents Pending.)

Adapted October 6th, simplifies the hanging. You can build your own frames at a cost of from 3 to 6 dollars. We provide stretcher free, and we show you by means of cuts how to do it.

Now get wise, write at once. Let us send you the evidence of your own eyes—our large free samples. Let us put you in touch with our nearest MIRROROIDE agency. Do it now.

THE TRUTH

ABOUT

"The Missing Woman"

(3 REELS)

State Rights Feature

Though we liked "The Missing Woman" we acted conservatively in ordering. When a number of clear-headed buyers of expert judgment so sincerely praised its novelty and "so differentness" we went ahead and ordered more. For this reason, and addedly because three buyers bought two copies, we can to-day offer the two remaining prints for unsold territories.

We don't believe you want to be bullied by big adjectives into buying. We don't want you to be influenced by anything other than your own good sense and your film needs. What do you say?

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and anyone can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact, they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of $3.50 we will send, by parcel post, prepaid and insured, the following:

24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address:

Sargent's Photoplay Service
To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:
Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.
Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.
Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

William Fox Signs "Sapho" for the Audubon, His Most Beautiful Theatre in New York!

Scene from "Through the Sluice Gates"

The last great "SAPHO" achievement East is the securing of it by William Fox, the New York theatrical magnate, for his beautiful new Audubon Theatre. The deal went through last week. Fox is happy, the state-rights owner is happy, we're happy for—

Our "Sapho" is the Florence Roberts "Sapho" and the one American Audiences Want!

The Fox achievement is just one of many in the business of booking "SAPHO." Achievement is following achievement; everywhere the state-rights owners are "booking" the biggest and finest theaters in their localities. Oliver Morosco must have "started" the theatre men when he placed the picture in his superb Majestic, Los Angeles—the first film ever to "play" that famous home of legitimate attractions!

To Get Back to the Regular Releases

There's "THROUGH THE SLUICE GATES," the thriller of the year, released Sunday, October 19th.
"ALWAYS TOGETHER," all about a comedy goat, released Tuesday, October 21st.
"VENGEANCE," a strong love story, released Saturday, October 25th.
And a great TWO-REELER the week after, "THE OATH OF O'TSURU SAN," a Japanese-American production, released Tuesday, October 28th.

"THE PENDULUM OF FATE"

A clean, cleverly constructed melodrama with element of interest and suspense, admirably developed and sustained, give this picture-play not only stage values, but vivid realism to make its pathos and power vital and telling. An o'er true story of perils of the Peerage.

IN TWO REELS RELEASED OCTOBER 27th

October 28th "WHEN MAY WEDS DECEMBER"

A love-lost and love-regained romance, dealing with modern social conditions where money is an incentive to matrimony. That it ends well is due to the cleverness of its progenitor.

October 29th "TWO SACKS OF POTATOES"

A Western comedy drama that has cleverness of construction to sustain its interest and make it a very worthy and thrilling play with a good, red-blooded heroine to thwart a trio of villains.

On the same reel with

"A MUDDLE IN HORSE-THIEVES"

A swiftly galloping playlet amid picturesque surroundings.

October 30th "OLD DOC YAK AND THE ARTIST'S DREAM"

This popular creation of the famous cartoonist, Sidney Smith, springs from the line to life and moves about in droll and amusing fashion to make a dream come true and tickle the risibles mightily.

October 31st "THE DANGLING NOOSE"

The war over water-rights has been a source of constant contention all over the dry farm lands of the West since "free grass" forced the cattle men to send the picturesque cowboys into quieter occupation.

THANHOUSER 3 A WEEK

UNUSUAL, ISN'T IT?

Everybody who booked "MOTHS," with MAUDE FEALY, the First Thanhouser four-reel monthly special, has asked for a date on the second Thanhouser four-reel monthly special. The exchanges are asking "good money" for these specials, too. But "MOTHS" made money for every single exhibitor who showed it. "MOTHS" was a PRODUCTION, not a feature. So is "ROBIN HOOD." That's why the exhibitor who had the first special wants the second. NATURAL, ISN'T IT?

THE THREE A WEEK

Released, Sunday October 26th

"THE SILVER-TONGUED ORATOR"

He enrolled in the Correspondence School of Oratory and made speeches everywhere. He promptly lost his sweetheart. His oratory must have been pretty bad, because he lost his job of grocery clerk, too, and none of the politicians would hire him to stump-speak for them. He wished, in the end, that he'd never left the grocery store.

Released Tuesday, October 28th

"HOW FILMY WON HIS SWEETHEART"

Filmy operated the picture machine at the theatre, and, being rejected by his lady love, was very nervous all evening. In fact, he threw some of the pictures on the screen upside down, and the audience howled. Filmy was "fired" by the red-hot manager, and you'd thought his love prospects were worse off than ever, wouldn't you? Instead, his bad luck sent him good luck and the girl.

Released Friday, October 31st

"A TWENTIETH CENTURY FARMER"

It was the banker or the farmer for their daughter, and the "wise" parents picked the banker. But the girl selected the farmer, and spent her vacation on an old farm, learning the arduous duties of farm-wife. Behold! when she marries and goes to her husband's farm, she finds that the arduous duties aren't there at all! For his is a twentieth century farm that needed no woman to operate it.

Ten Reels of Action Condensed Into Three!

"CAPT. KIDD" will be released Tuesday, November 4th. It is the first of a series of pirate pictures produced under the brainy direction of Otis Turner with the Universal's new star, David Hartford, in the title role. The other two pirate pictures, for release later, are "Under the Black Flag" and "The Buccaneer." YOU WILL WANT THE WHOLE SERIES.

"CAPT. KIDD" will probably create even a greater sensation than our recent wonderful animal feature entitled "The Coils of the Python," which has excited the whole film trade. Make arrangements right this minute so that your exchange can give you the earliest possible booking. It is going to make your theatre THE TALK OF THE WHOLE TOWN.

"CAPT. KIDD" will have two kinds of 1-sheets, a striking 3-sheet and the most stunning 6-sheet posters ever used for moving pictures. Posters, announcement slides, heralds and lobby photos for "Capt. Kidd" should be ordered immediately from your exchange. "Capt. Kidd" is only three reels in length but it contains ENOUGH ACTION FOR TEN REELS.

"30 FAMOUS FEATURES A YEAR"

The eminent romantic actor in his most famous characterization

"The World is Mine"

This is the dramatic thought expressed by

James O'Neill

"The Count of Monte Cristo"

when, after years of suffering and humiliation, he obtains power and fortune. With "The Count of Monte Cristo" every exhibitor can proclaim:

"The film world is mine"

This famous actor and fascinating play have been endorsed by three generations of continued popularity.

James O'Neill's interpretation of Dumas' guiding character will be recorded as one of the greatest glories of modern dramatic art.

THE FAMOUS PLAYERS FILM CO. feels the least bit proud in thus perpetuating Mr. O'Neill's greatest dramatic success—a success which overthrew all contemporary stage traditions.

This production is protected by copyright and any infringements will be prosecuted to the full extent of the law.

Released November 1st in five reels

Pendleton, a New Yorker, marries Margaret Brown, and John Forbes, her rejected lover, swears to ruin him. Forbes becomes a financial power, and when he hears of Margaret's death he smashes Pendleton's fortune. Pendleton and his daughter, Margaret, go West with a little money they have saved. Forbes, going West to inspect one of his properties, falls down a cliff, and is found unconscious by Margaret, who, not recognizing him, takes him to their cabin. Pendleton is terribly affected by Forbes' presence, but permits him to be nursed back to health by Margaret. Forbes, overcome by remorse, restores Pendleton's fortune, and the romance which was shattered in his youth begins anew with the younger Margaret.

Bait

ONCE upon a time a man went fishing. The man's name was Bill. Bill didn't know anything about fishing, but his intentions were excellent. He studied the advertisements of the fishing tackle makers. Then he purchased an equipment of the finest rod, reel, line, hooks and sinker. Taking these with him, Bill put out in a brand new skiff to the fishing grounds. But when everything was ready for the first cast, Bill found that he had entirely overlooked a most essential item, BAIT. Bait had not been mentioned in the fishing tackle ads. Bill knew nothing at all about BAIT. But his confidence in his equipment was such that he went right ahead fishing with bare hooks. With a patience born of ignorance Bill kept at his work until the day was done, and then started to reel up to go home. There was something heavy on his line. It proved to be an old leather satchel. It was filled with paper money—slimy and soft, but still negotiable.

Bill's story soon spread throughout the country—people everywhere began reading the fishing tackle ads and investing their money in good equipments and taking their time from regular business to go fishing for money with bare hooks. Needless to say, there were no more money bags caught, and many a man who had been well to do became well done and ended his days in a county poor house. But the lesson was valuable. Thousands of other fishermen discovered their folly in time. They set aside their equipments for a while and studied BAIT. Then they experimented a little, and found that, while an occasional fish could be tempted with cheap, dead bait, the big and frequent catches could be made only with LIVE, FRESH, SELECTED BAIT. And thereafter these men waxed prosperous, and were known as SUCCESSFUL fishermen.

The Moving Picture game is like fishing on shore.

Bill is the Exhibitor. The tackle and boat are the equipment and the theatre. The good Bait is the good picture. Occasionally there is a Bill who catches money with bad pictures. He uses bare hooks. There are hundreds of other exhibitors who have heard of Bill's blind luck. They have read the fishing tackle advertisements of the manufacturers and purchased the finest equipment, only to find that the public will not bite. These men should Study the Bait Question Now. They should learn the positive truth, that no matter how fine the theatre or how happy the location, it is the Picture that draws and holds the crowds. The exhibitors who learn this lesson will wax prosperous. They will be known as SUCCESSFUL exhibitors. Here's the answer to the Bait Question:—

A SELECTION of the finest pictures in the world, made by the ten manufacturers whose films have long been acknowledged as incomparably superior to all others, on one program. ON ONE PROGRAM!

Hope

Selig. Two Reels. Released November 3rd.

Suggested by the superb symbolical painting by the late William Watt, of the Royal Academy of England, entitled "Hope," a story is here told which is full of heart throbs from start to finish.

Hope Anderson, the good angel of Poverty Flat, a rare, radiant and unselfish beauty, devotes her entire life to making the lives of those about her more bright and hopeful.

Singularly enough, while vastly successful in aiding others, unkindly fate has decreed that her own life shall be a series of disappointments.

Despite all this, her sorrows are not so great that she ceases to be a well-spring of joy to others.

This is truly a great story of devotion and self-secrifice which claims its reward not here but in the life to come.

Zuma, the Gypsy

Kleine-Cines. Two Reels. Released November 4th.

A beautiful story of the dog-like devotion of a gypsy girl and snake charmer purchased from her cruel master by a kindly hearted Count and his wife.

Zuma drives from the Count's home a woman friend of the Countess who flirts with the Count—and then comes the revelation that the faithful gypsy girl herself nurses an all-consuming love for the Count. Torn between her love for her mistress and her love for the Count, Zuma takes the road to death rather than prove unfaithful.

The Man Who Vanished

Kalem. Two Reels. Released November 5th.

A scheming uncle and aunt attempt to secure, by resorting to foul play, the estate which is inherited by their nephew, Hobart Schuyler.

Thinking that they have succeeded in this, they take possession of the house, only to learn later that their plan has failed and their victim is on the road to recovery.

Hobart's sweetheart, who has nursed him back to health, accidentally gets hold of the evidence which will convict the guilty ones.

They imprison the girl in a fireproof vault, and a rescue in the nick of time saves her life.

Confronted by the evidence of their dastardly crime, the uncle and aunt are led away to punishment and disgrace.

The Price of Victory

Lubin. Two Reels. Released November 6th.

Taking us back to the Civil War, we are told a beautiful story of love, patriotism and reckless bravery.

Col. Robert Carey, a young Southerner, and his sweetheart, Lorena Gray, are separated by a lovers' quarrel. A year later, chance brings them together as he lies desperately wounded in the performance of his duty. Unable to carry out his mission, she persuades him to allow her to take his place, and although he knows he is sending her to certain death, he gives to his cause far more than his own life and bids her go.

She succeeds in blowing up the bridge just in the nick of time, and pays for the victory with her life.

Carey is ever in the forefront of the battle, but the swift death for which he longs passes him by.

Years later, in his old age he seeks out the grave of his dead love and falls asleep to find the weary waiting done.

Race Memories

Pathe. Two Reels. Released November 6th.

An unusual story is here told with scientific accuracy of one Denton, an anthropologist of note, who, in love with a fair neighbor, finds himself confronted with an obstinate father who insists upon her marriage to another man because of his wealth.

Worn out by over-study, he becomes a victim of brain fever and lives again in a prehistoric existence, where he wanders as a stone-age savage, meets and loves the girl of his heart.

After struggles with a savage rival and hand-to-hand combat with wild beasts, he finalls wins out.

Just so the modern Denton finally triumphs over the wealth of his modern rival.

The Death Weight

Essanay. Two Reels. Released November 7th.

Two shiftless nephews, chagrined at the accidental discovery that their uncle's ward is to be his sole heir.

Interrupted by her lover in a struggle with the old man, they plan to murder him so that his rescuer will get the blame.

Their plan is partially carried out, the old man mysteriously disappears and the innocent man is accused of murder.

Later they rig up an ingenious machine of death and make the old man divulge the hiding place of his wealth.

Just before carrying out the final details of their fiendish plan, they are interrupted and leave quickly.

They fight over the spoils, and one is killed. The other is later thrown over a cliff by Tom, and old Silas thanks Tom and Alice and blesses them in their happy union.

A Face from the Past

Edison. Two Reels. Released November 7th.

Driving through a little village, Edward Pendleton sees a beautiful face and falls in love. After an ardent courtship he wins Margaret Brown's love and, marrying her, takes her away to the city.

John Forbes, a young farmer, had worshipped Margaret with all the intensity of a boy's devotion.

He swears undying vengeance on the man who took her away.

In later years Forbes becomes a great financier in the city.

He succeeds in carrying out his threat to wipe out Pendleton's fortune, and Pendleton has to go West.

Two years later Forbes meets with a serious accident in the West, and is rescued by Pendleton's daughter, Margaret. In his delirium he thinks her his former sweetheart.

The meeting between Pendleton and Forbes is a dramatic one.

Forbes restores Pendleton's fortune, and we leave him, still a young man to all intents, with beautiful young Margaret Pendleton to renew the romance so unfortunately shattered years before.

The Diver

Vitagraph. Two Reels. Released November 8th.

The cleverness of a woman whose love is spurred on by jealousy gives this story an unusual amount of human interest.

John Hawley, loved by a young widow, Rita Melrose, becomes infatuated with a diver, Mlle. Vivian, while attending a performance with his host, Rupert Brachin.

Rita very cleverly plans so that Hawley shall suspect Vivian of an affair with his friend Brachin.

Later Vivian heroically rescues Brachin's little girl from being swept over Niagara Falls, and Rita, conscience stricken, confesses her intrigue, and all is forgiven.

A CHARMING, SPLENDIDLY TOLD KLEINE-CINES

IN TWO PARTS

(Copyright, 1913, By George Kleine.)

"THE PENALTY"

(Release Tuesday, November 11th)

James Moretto, in a fit of anger, kills his companion. He rushes away to the woods and falls in with kindly peasants. When the police track him, Moretto again takes to the woods. He is cared for by Annie, daughter of the friendly peasant, and love grows between them.

The marshal in charge of the man hunt receives a letter from his mother, telling of her longing to again see the marshal's brother. Later, the brother of Annie finds Moretto in the woods and quarrels with him. He informs the marshal, who, with a posse, calls at the home of the peasants. Annie, seeing danger near for her loved one, joins him in the woods, where they give battle to the posse.

How, when the fight was lost, and Moretto saw his own doom before him, he saved Annie's reputation by a clever ruse—and how, when the marshal had effected his capture, he recognized in the marshal his own brother, makes a thoroughly delightful, prettily told story.

In jail, Moretto is offered escape by Annie, who works her way to his cell. Moretto knows that to make his escape would mean the dishonoring of his brother. The choice he takes provides a fitting moral to an intensely interesting, highly dramatic, two-part subject.

IT IS MARKED BY SPLENDID ACTING, INTENSE SITUATIONS AND A STORY THAT HAS A PRONOUNCED INTEREST

Olga Ring, a banker's daughter, is wearied with the monotony of her quiet life, and seeing in a newspaper the "ad" of an artist desiring a model, answers it. She is chosen from many applicants and gives the name of Sarah Smith. The young artist falls in love with her and she accepts his advances. A friend of his, however, tells him the girl is unworthy and that he can prove it. The artist permits the test and from concealment sees with horror the girl receive his friend's kisses. Later his uncle takes him to see the daughter of a friend of his. The artist is amazed to find her his faithless model. She denies that she is Sarah Smith and rushes back to his studio before he can get there. He puts a mark upon her for future recognition. Later he identifies Olga by his mark and reveals all to her father, who orders her from the house. Destitute she makes a scanty living from singing in the streets and cheap cafés. Luckily she is found by the artist who, loving her still, takes her to his studio. In spite of her former indiscretions she loves him and they are happy.

Facts and Comments

ANY body of organized exhibitors, whether it is a local or a State or a national body, ought as a matter of common sense and self-protection keep out of politics. The action of one of our local organizations in the East committing itself to the support of a certain candidate in the midst of a heated campaign cannot be deplored too much. A consistent neutrality in politics seems to us one of the plainest requirements in the conduct of every non-political organization. Exhibitors organize not for the protection of the fortunes of political candidates but strictly for the advancement of their own particular calling. Where a number of candidates are seeking the suffrages of their fellow-citizens and all are equally friendly to the motion picture interests, it is sheer stupidity to commit or even to try to commit the organization to the support of any particular candidate. Supposing the other man is elected, and supposing he is narrow-minded enough to remember the opposition of the moving picture men to his candidacy. That would mean breakers ahead for all exhibitors. The worst service an organization of exhibitors can do is to bring down the anger of politicians upon the whole profession. To inject politics into the management of an organization of exhibitors is to disrupt the organization. Where an official has shown malicious hostility against the motion picture and has oppressed and harassed moving picture men and then goes before the public for re-election on his record, it is the duty of an organization of exhibitors to take a stand in the campaign. It is all right to fight back when you are unjustly attacked, but it is foolish to go out of your way and provoke a fight without cause.

OUR remarks about the impending change in the unit of the motion picture entertainment have brought forth a number of most interesting and valuable suggestions from practical exhibitors. In the main the impression seems to be that the change in the unit from one thousand to two thousand feet need not detract from the variety of the moving picture program. One of our esteemed correspondents writing from a Western State puts the whole situation in a nutshell in these words: "The feature is here to stay, . . . it fills its place wonderfully and is a grand innovation for the motion picture, but it should not be made to crowd out the thousand feet motion unit, that universal amusement of the busy and nervous citizen. My belief is that the average picture patron will want the thousand feet unit displayed where he can enjoy it without being compelled to sit through thirty to sixty minutes of one subject. He would prefer to have the feature housed independent of the single reel subject. Then he can go and see his 'legitimate' picture when time and inclination afford."

This statement of the situation, we think, goes to the very root of the matter. There will hereafter be houses in which the feature will be the rule and the single reel the exception, and then again there will be houses which will depend in the main on the single reel and offer a feature only upon occasions. These things will regulate themselves in due course of time, and the industry as a whole will be a gainer in the end. Our correspondent expresses a hope "that the exhibitors of the country will in the near future rise as one man and demand of the manufacturers fewer and better features. . . . Better by far two single-reel pictures than one two-reel drama of mediocre quality." To all of which we say "Amen." Our friend might have used a far stronger word than mediocre in describing the quality of too many of our features.

In plain justice to the reputable and ambitious producers of features it must be added that the exhibitors themselves are to blame for much of the "feature" trash now on the market. The wretched and fraudulent imitations of great features have been a fruitful source of loss and annoyance to our good producers. Now, these cheap abortions could not have lived a day if exhibitors had not been willing to share the pirates' guilt by palming off the spurious for the genuine article on their patrons. This sort of "showmen" will never ask for the better quality but always for the worst. There are always two sides to this question of a demand for high quality. It costs a lot of real money to put quality into films, and we have no right to ask for high quality unless we are prepared to pay for it. It is very easy to demand high quality and to admire high quality, but in order to be consistent we must be ready to help high quality practically by paying the price.

The Turn of the Defense

Hearings in the Suit of U. S. vs. Motion Picture Patents Co. and Others Resumed in This City.

THE hearings in the case of the Federal government against the Motion Picture Patents Co., The General Film Co. and other defendants have been resumed and in familiar phrase "are now going on" at the Hotel Manhattan, on the southwest corner of 42d Street and Madison Avenue. There had been considerable delay, due to the attorneys for the defense, who were not ready to go on at the time set for the resumption of the hearings on the 1st day of this month. There has been no change of counsel, and the array of legal talent was the same on both sides when H. N. Marvin, president of the Motion Picture Patents Co. and actively connected with the Biograph Co., was called as the first witness for the defense. In response to questions by one of the defendant's attorneys the witness gave a succinct narrative of the moving picture industry from its beginnings in this country. He said that in 1908 and prior to the formation of the Motion Picture Patents Co. conditions were very discouraging to the advancement of the motion picture art. He said that there had been much litigation between the various producers in regard to patents and that the discontinuance of this litigation and an intelligent union of interests really led up to the formation of the Motion Picture Patents Co. According to the witness, the result of the formation of the Motion Picture Patents Co. was a very immediate "and extensive expansion of the entire art." Witness testified that since the formation of the Patents Co. there had been great progress in the dramatic art in the moving picture industry. He explained in answer to his attorney's question that the change from selling to leasing films was due to the fact that the reels were considered "vehicles of the drama and must therefore be conserved carefully." When asked about the two dollars royalty, which the defendants claimed from the exhibitors to whom they issued a license, witness replied that he thought this amount to be a very low figure "compared with the revenues derived by the exhibitor for the use of the projection machines." The object of imposing this royalty, according to the witness, was "to encourage multiplicity in moving picture exhibitions throughout the country." Witness called attention to the fact that the Armat Company, former owners of the Armat-Jenkins patents, exacted twenty-five dollars a week as royalty for the use of their patents.

Counsel for the defense asked what the object of forming the Motion Picture Patents Co. had been, and whether the Motion Picture Patents Co. had ever intended to stifle competition. Witness answered that the object of forming the Motion Picture Patents Co. was to promote competition. The attorney for the defense offered in evidence a number of letters from different departments of the U. S. Government, addressed to the Motion Picture Patents Co. From these letters it appeared that the Motion Picture Patents Co. had been requested by various branches of the Federal government to give their consent to the filming of Indians, etc. Mr. Grosvenor, deputy attorney-general, objected to this evidence on the ground that such correspondence could in no event confer immunity upon the defendants, and was therefore inadmissible. The objection was placed on record and will be passed upon at the final argument.

After explaining at great length the workings of the present National Board of Censors, the witness was led by his attorney into the question of the absorption of the different film exchanges by the General Film Co. Witness testified that when he at first proposed to the licensed manufacturers that they themselves handle the distribution of their products, he was met with objections from various quarters. Some of the manufacturers openly expressed their fears of losing money in the scheme, according to the witness. Nothing was further from the mind of the organizers of the General Film Co. than the idea of making any profit by the distribution of their own product, said the witness. He added the idea of forming the General Film Co. and of buying up the old exchanges did not develop in his mind until the latter part of 1909. Witness said that many of the licensed exchanges had been inefficient and some of them had been financially irresponsible. Something like an hour was then occupied by the attorneys for the defense in putting in and offering in evidence letters from exhibitors and exchangemen to the Motion Picture Patents Co. claiming that the methods of distribution were unsatisfactory. The witness denied the truth of the testimony given by the witness, Lewis M. Swaab, of Philadelphia, Pa., who had been called by the government and whose testimony was reported in detail in these columns. Witness said that the license of Swanson, who has also testified for the government in this suit, had been canceled because Swanson had not bought enough film under the condition of his license.

Despite the vigorous protests of counsel for the government the hearings were adjourned by order of the examiner to Monday, November 10th. At the resumption of the hearing the witness Marvin will again go on the stand.

Notable Kalem Enterprise

A Coming Feature of Truly Heroic Size.

By W. Stephen Bush.

WITHIN a week or two the Kalem Co. will release a multiple reel consisting of five, possibly six parts. The title will be "General Wolfe or The Conquest of Canada." Of this production it is impossible to speak too highly. I am the last man to measure the merits of any film by the amount of money it has cost to produce it, but there is no question that in this instance, the lavish expenditure of money has helped to make this picture a great and honest success. The spending of money, however, has been but one cause of its success. The foundation of it was laid in the choice of the subject. Because of this choice and because of the faithful and accurate reproduction of this great historical event, the moving picture art is now enriched by what may justly be called an epic poem in motion pictures. The story is of heroic size; the two great men who stand in the center of things are of heroic size and the theater of events, so truly and graphically portrayed, measures up to heroic standards.

I believe that this is the first time that a historic work of recognized value has ever been used as the basis of the filming of a historic subject. This fact alone gives unique merit to the production. The Kalem Co. has followed the narrative of Francis Parkman in his "Montcalm and Wolfe."

Could there have been a finer theme for an epic in motion pictures than the gallant contest between England and France for the possession of Canada? Here were two mighty nations richly but variously endowed, contending for supremacy in the New World.

This Kalem production will have another merit which it does not share with any other feature—the subject is a New World subject, a story pleasantly familiar to every school boy in the English-speaking world.

Nine weeks have been spent on this production and there were no idle moments in these nine weeks. The battle of the Heights of Abraham and the capture of Quebec are the chief events of the story, but there is a fullness of detail in the preliminaries, a fullness of detail which is rich in picturesque effects. The camp on the island of Orleans, which is a replica of the original; the tents along the river, the Indian allies and the battle of Montmorenci Falls are but a few of the minor features of this great epic in films. True to its traditions, the Kalem Co. has been a stickler for the authentic action on the authentic spots. It has reproduced the fleet of Wolfe's ships and in order to get one great historic vessel still remaining it paid a fancy price and furnished a bond of ten thousand dollars. The fights on the river between the English and French and the employment by the latter of burning rafts built of combustible material have been faithfully reproduced. In the artillery fights the old French cannon was specially mounted and used for this production. Indeed, the stamp of the genuine with its irresistible charm is plainly marked on every inch of these films.

While the historic value of this feature will always distinguish it from all others, its paramount title to popularity lies in the superb spectacular effects with which the picture is filled from beginning to end. The Kalem Co. hired armies of imposing numbers, brilliantly costumed and armed and splendidly drilled. Just before the Kalems began their work in Canada there had been a centenary celebration and there was a good supply of uniforms which, however, was much augmented by a corps of seamstresses who were set to work to complete the required number. The incidents of the preliminary campaign culminating in the battle at Montmorenci Falls afforded great advantages for military display and the execution of military maneuvers. The country around Montmorenci Falls is justly considered one of the beauty spots of Canada, and favored by good weather, a series of very thrilling and sensational skirmishes were made. Speaking of spectacular effects, a special word is due to the Indians. Determined to be historically exact at whatever cost or trouble, the producers sent for the Canghnawaga tribe of Indians, whose forefathers had been the allies of the French under Montcalm and Vaudreuil. These Indians were brought from the neighborhood of Montreal.

The spectacles formed while this magnificent feature was in the making were much appreciated by the people of Quebec. They were delighted with the flood of American Dollars poured into the ancient town and often business was suspended in the city to watch the Kalem armies at work. The pictures making up the capture of Quebec are especially impressive, for the old city has changed but little since the days of Montcalm and Wolfe, and the historic gates through which the English army entered, the house in which Wolfe died and every spot made memorable by the famous siege and battle are to be seen on the screen with absolute fidelity to history. A complete review of this great production will be published in the Moving Picture World as soon as the pictures will be ready for exhibition.

"The Trail of the Lost Chord"

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

ADELAIDE A. PROCTOR'S celebrated poem, "The Lost Chord," has been interpreted by Thomas Ricketts, of the American, in two reels of pictures under the title, "The Trail of the Lost Chord." Nearly everyone is familiar with the words as set to music by Arthur Sullivan, and many have been fortunate enough to hear them sung by the great Caruso.

Scene from "The Trail of the Lost Chord" (American).

Director Ricketts has brought to this almost sacred subject a spirit of reverence and becoming, artistic skill. His treatment has been harmonious throughout, and not once are we jarred by a discordant note. He has been aided in creating right impressions by the noble settings furnished by the Santa Barbara Mission and its picturesque environment. The chapel scenes, I understand, have been built in the American studio, as the Mission authorities would not permit the taking of pictures in the consecrated building. These scenes are in thorough keeping with the subject, and bear a soothing atmosphere.

Scene from "The Trail of the Lost Chord" (American).

The pictured interpretation shows a venerable priest, Father Josef, seated at the chapel organ, his whole soul being poured into the inspiring music. A young man, a protege, enters and whispers that the father of his sweetheart is dying and is anxious to see his daughter married before death claims him. The good father goes at once to the bedside and performs the ceremony. He surprises the young people by telling them that in the very same room, fifty years before, he himself was about to wed the girl of his choice. Then he goes back to the chapel, feeling that the end of his long life is near; and, as he plays, all the memories of the great love of his youth troop joyously upon him.

He sees himself, a young musician, giving lessons on the piano to beautiful Marie, daughter of the old Spanish grandee. He feels again the ardor of his first love and the joy on finding that Marie returns it. Then he sees himself driven from the house by Marie's father, and how, in his despair, the good Father Superior, of the Franciscan order, cheers him and finds employment for him; how he succeeds in securing a home of his own and the sanction of Marie's father to their marriage. Then the wedding day comes into the mind's vision; how Marie and he set out on horseback to the church, followed by father and mother and the good neighbors; how Marie's horse took fright and galloped madly away, he following in grim despair to save her; how he found her unconscious on the roadway and bore her back tenderly to her deathbed in the old home.

Then the years of sorrow and grief come back to him, and how he had been guided to find comfort by the good Father Superior in taking the orders of the church; how he had devoted his years to deeds of love and mercy, never forgetting the mound that marked the resting place of his dead Marie. Still playing the organ, as with his last breath, he is impelled to look upwards and sees the spirit of Marie hovering near him. His head falls gently forward on the keys, and his spirit joins Marie's in their flight heavenward.

> It may be that Death's bright angel
> Will speak in that chord again;
> It may be that only in Heaven,
> I shall hear that grand Amen.

Again are we treated to really delightful acting by Ed. Coxen and Miss Winnifred Greenwood in the parts of Father Josef and Marie. Mr. Coxen's character drawing of the aged and venerable priest is worthy of high praise. He is realizing fully the promise given by his early efforts in the service of the American. Miss Greenwood is a charming Marie and looks more prepossessing than ever in this dainty role. The Father Superior, of the Franciscan order, as presented by Chester Withey, is very well drawn.

The photography of these films is of good quality. The beautiful exterior settings cannot fail to excite admiration. The release date is Monday, Nov. 17.

MARGARITA FISCHER.

Margarita Fischer has natural vivacity in an ingenue role and her sincere, vigorous interpretation of an emotional part stamps her as a talented and finished actress. With her fascinating smile and the joy she radiates there is combined a sincerity of expression toward all with whom she comes in contact, aside from the fact that she holds an enviable position as leading lady in one of the best-known film companies.

Margarita Fischer.

Her versatility has been one of the strongest factors in fashioning her career. Playing leading woman and child parts alternately in the old "rep" days is one feature that stands in the career of Miss Fischer. She first became leading woman with Walter Sanford in San Francisco with whom she had considerable experience as a child. It was not unusual for her to play Topsy in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" one night and Mary Magdalene the next. Her first picture experience was with the Selig, where she remained for a year. From there she went to the American and then to the Imp. Then, when the Universal consolidation came, she went with the Nestor, then with the Bison and then on to the Rex, where she is now being featured.

One of her recent screen characterizations which brought much praise was that of an Oriental priestess in the Rex drama, "The Diamond Makers." She played an absorbing game, first as the determined and clever woman, and then as the completely feminine girl whose veiled glances caught the eyes of the pursuing man and held him spellbound.

S. S. HUTCHINSON RETURNS TO CALIFORNIA.

After a brief stay at Chicago, Mr. Hutchinson, President of the American Film Mfg. Co., returns to the studios and laboratories at Santa Barbara, California, where he will personally supervise the production of a number of big features soon to be put out by this company. He was due to arrive at Santa Barbara about October 20th and will remain there several months.

"The Phantom Signal"

Edison Two-Reel Drama of the Railroad.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS spirited play, while sensational in development, is thoroughly up to date in its purpose and theme. It deals with what concerns people in all those parts of the world where there is corporate conspiracy against public interest. While it does not designate, or even suggest, the particular railroad which furnishes background for its action, it certainly applies to the one in control of New England transportation, which has put that entire section of the country under tribute to a group of capitalists.

"The Phantom Signal" strikes at the futility of our railroad regulations, but it does not strike hard enough, the talented author contenting himself with picturing conditions which have recently caused one disaster after another and terrible loss of life near New York City. He, however, puts the guilt where it belongs, upon the directors and corporate head, by indicating the long hours and exhausting work of men at important signal stations. Such screen portrayals deserve praise, more praise if they are kept going, because they may have an effect where a whole generation of agitation and legislation has ended in fiasco. Millions of people will be set to thinking by the establishment and continuance of sociological plays, and the finest political economy in the world is the enlightenment of humankind.

Scene from "The Phantom Signal" (Edison).

There is plenty of material left. I refer the author to various acts of congress ordering railroads to equip their cars with automatic couplers, air brakes and other modern devices to do away with a slaughter equal to that of the Balkan War. Few comply and many evade all forms of regulation, fitting their lines with only a fraction of what is required, while earning a surplus of millions. The stockholders must be considered, no matter how many are killed, obedience to the laws being regarded as a secondary matter. Stockholders are not interested because they are not switchmen, but "The Phantom Signal" shows that employees may not be the only victims. There is additional opportunity to exhibit the moral character of demands made upon the public for enormous gains by the advance and maintenance of rates, with no compensating general advantage of safety in transportation. There is opportunity to domesticate railroad owners and managers into good citizens without sending them to jail.

Interesting incidents abound in the Edison play, but most original is the constant appearance of a phantom just before each disaster, a very animated skeleton that appears on the scene and forecasts tragedy to follow, a clever piece of double exposure. Another double exposure is probably responsible for the approach of two trains on a V switch, one coming up each line to the point. These ingenious effects have their value—the story must be made interesting first and instructive as an apparently secondary consideration. The acting is uniformly good, but the author should devise his next play of this order so that there is a central figure of sympathetic importance in opposition to the active cause of all the trouble. He should also be more forceful in his subtitles. Do not be afraid of subtitles in a feature play. They help immensely if they are selected with discrimination and vigorously worded. The play should appeal to all classes, at home and abroad.

"The Barbary Coast"

A Two-Reel Subject by the Progressive Film Producers of America.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

"THE Barbary Coast," we had been given to understand, is the San Francisco replica of our own Tenderloin, which is supposed to rank high in the esteem of His Satanic Majesty. "The Barbary Coast" is now a thing of the past, licenses for all the wicked places having been refused by the authorities. Before the curtain was rung down forever the Progressive Film Producers of America went forth with their cameras and made a permanent pictorial record of Barbary Coast. Seldom has a two reel feature aroused more interest among the distinguished moving picture critics than this same Barbary Coast. Mr. Clymer, who introduced these two very interesting reels to the press of New York, had been greatly troubled about possible objections to the filming of such a subject from a moral point of view. This is no reviewer's inference, but the direct statement of Mr. Clymer himself. To ease his mind he summoned the critics, well knowing that if the picture met the requirements of their stern code of ethics he might with safety submit it to the Board of Censors. The critics were on hand with rare but commendable promptness. If there were any shocking things in these two reels not an inch thereof must escape their watchful eyes. Old and blase critics who gossip and dally with cigarettes while an ordinary supply of pictorial art is being displayed on the screen, hung with mute and undivided attention on those two reels. It was only at the very last scene that they relaxed their moral vigilance and came to the conclusion that there was not one improper and illegitimate shock in the entire production. They freely expressed their opinion to Mr. Clymer who seemed pleased, though some of the critics used slightly unparliamentary language in recording their opinion.

Scene from "The Barbary Coast" (Progressive).

In all seriousness this is a splendid picture. The taking of the night scenes must have been a task of tremendous difficulty but it was done very finely indeed and no audience will fail to appreciate it. What there is of dancing—and there is quite a little—is performed by real artists, and I have rarely seen livelier and more graceful dancing; it was indeed poetry translated into motion. There is not a dull moment in the picture and not an inch of padding. One wishes for more than two thousand feet of this exciting but clean sensation. I do not hesitate to commend this picture without reserve or qualification.

PRESIDENT WILSON IN BOY SCOUT PICTURE.

President Wilson, honorary president of the Boy Scouts of America, it is announced, will play an important role in the seven-reel story of "The Making of a Boy Scout." The picture will be shown in fifteen cities. The cost of the production is said to have been very heavy, but the organization expects a substantial profit from its exhibition.

"The Diver."

Sensational and Beautiful Two-Reel Vitagraph.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THE sensational part of this photodrama relates to the rescue of a child from a boat in the rapids above Niagara Falls, and many views of this thrilling portion are of exceptional interest, but there is an essence of beauty throughout the entire production, really a play of fashionable society as it is and not as it is ordinarily represented on the screen. The environment is uniformly that of those persons of wealth who associate through tastes convivial in small bodies and are largely occupied with entertaining one another. Certain daintiness of etiquette, fraternity of feeling, freedom from drudgery, ease of mind and manner, a subtle je ne sais quoi, characterizes the conduct of Americans born and brought up in Butterfly Land, but it is seldom, if ever, depicted on the screen. We are rarely permitted to forget that we are looking at actor ladies and gentlemen.

Scene from "The Diver" (Vitagraph).

"The Diver" glimpses society people as they are, at home, at garden fetes, flitting about in search of amusement, all without intruding this accuracy of portrayal upon the subject matter. It is simply a pervading influence, atmosphere. The people live amid luxury and good taste at home; they move about in gardens of lovely flowers; they watch an aquatic spectacle from the grassy banks of a lake; there are apparently no hewers of wood and drawers of water among them, none of those staggering under heavy burdens or torn by passion's tortuous scourging. A little cloud appears upon this serene horizon when a splendidly-formed professional swimmer engages the attention of two society men, a bachelor and a benedict, who induce her to appear as the leading attraction of a lawn fete.

Scene from "The Diver" (Vitagraph).

The Lady Diver, almost Lady Godiva in professional costume, becomes a social lion, but it is not she who "spoils the bread and spills the wine that makes brutes men and men divine." It is an intriguing little widow who is in love with the bachelor. The widow does an inconceivable amount of scheming to give Lady Diver a disastrous reputation and involves the good name of others in her selfish plans. She sends flowers the married man intended for his wife—men send their wives flowers in the very best screen society—to Lady Diver and finally impersonates the husband paying the aquatic performer a midnight visit, all of which is very stagey and unnecessary. She succeeds, however, in bringing about a sad state of affairs, when the entire social body is transported on the magic rug of stage license to Niagara Falls. The Lady Diver's name has been soiled, but she is a wholesome sort of woman and not to be blown away on a breath of scandal.

We are now at Niagara with the same social clique shown in part one, and we are certainly treated to some beautiful views. A child in the party wanders away from the nursemaid, climbs into a skiff and goes drifting down towards the cataract. She is so near that we can almost hear it roar, when the party of ladies and gentlemen discover her. So, also, does Lady Diver. She is standing on one of the rustic bridges that connect islands above the falls when she catches sight of the child in the boat. She disrobes—partially—on the spot, springs into the rapids, swims to the boat, takes the child from it, swims to shore and saves the child at terrible cost of physical exhaustion, while we see the boat go over the edge of the falls. This part is a veritable thriller and all ends happily when the conscience-stricken widow confesses her misdeeds.

"The Kissing Cup."

Four-Part Hepworth Contains Good Aeroplane Scene and Views of Sandringham Race.

THE Hepworth Company of England has gone to the Sandringham race course for the scenes of its latest drama, "The Kissing Cup." An unusual turn is given to this four-part picture by reason of the fact that the horse and boy rider featured form the winning combination. They are actually first under the wire in a stirring contest. The story is of the race course. There is in it not much that is essentially new, there being the familiar owner in straightened circumstances, the man with a long-standing grudge who plots his failure, the kidnapping of the jockey, and the consequent desperate efforts to find the boy and get him back to the track in time for the race. The atmosphere of the race course is well established, however. There are in the cast several persons who apparently belong to the turf.

One of the notable incidents in the picture is the use of an aeroplane for conveying the jockey back to the track. The little fellow, who as the son of the trainer has been selected to ride the racer after the horse has refused to carry the jockey specially engaged for him, has been taken in the night well out of town and hidden in an old structure. Pursuers have after many difficulties got word of his whereabouts and secured him. The automobile in which he is returning is stalled in a stream, near an aeroplane station. The lad and one of his rescuers are taken into a machine and started for the track. The biplane makes a splendid landing just in front of the camera—and the three passengers alight. It is straight stuff; it is a pleasure to note the fact.

The photography is good. The acting is not in all cases all to be desired. There is too much sameness to the gesticulation—for instance, the striking of the fist in the open palm. There is also a tendency on the part of some to overact. Racing pictures are always popular, and "The Kissing Cup" has many factors that should make it so. Chief of these are the getaway of the big field of racers and the good view of the big course.

A Farewell Dinner to Klein.

All-Star Feature Folk and a Few Friends Pass a Pleasant Evening at Healey's.

Phillip Klein, treasurer of the All-Star Feature Film Company, sailed for London last Wednesday morning, but before he got away his associates gathered a few friends and gave him a farewell beefsteak dinner at Healey's restaurant. There were many succulent slices of steak and juicy lamb chops passed around in the quaint log cabin room of that noted restaurant, accompanied by numerous mugs of creamy ale before the appetites of the assembled guests were satisfied. Then Harry Raver, president of the company, introduced Joe. "We have with us to-night" Farnham as toast master, whose string of chatter induced responses, wise and otherwise, from several of the invited guests. Those present were: Mr. and Mrs. Phillip Klein, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Raver, Mr. and Mrs. George J. Cooke, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Butler Graham, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence McGill, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Miles, Miss Edna Brown, Miss Natalie Toone, W. A. Johnston, Thomas Bedding, George D. Proctor, Joseph W. Farnham, Archie MacArthur, Fred Beecroft, Herbert L. Taylor, John B. Clymer, W. P. Milligan and James L. Hoff.

The party posed for a flashlight picture and then adjourned to trip the light fantastic in an adjoining room. It was a pleasant evening and all enjoyed the little gathering.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

NEW YORK STATE MEETING.

Election of Officers Concludes the Second Days Proceedings —Banquet at Hotel Rochester in the Evening.

LAST week's issue of the Moving Picture World gave the proceedings of the first day of the New York State League meeting at Rochester. On Thursday, the second day of the meeting, most of the time was taken up with the adoption of a constitution and by-laws. This work having been satisfactorily disposed of, officers were elected as follows:

President, A. N. Wolff, Rochester; National Vice-President, Sidney Ascher, New York; 1st Vice-President, F. C. Pierce, Geneva; 2d Vice-President, E. M. Day, Auburn; Secretary, Morris L. Fleischman, New York; Treasurer, W. C. Hubbard, Rochester; Sergeant-at-Arms, W. E. Whiting, Brockport.

During the afternoon session Miss Amy Brown, Dr. Leffingill and Rev. Arthur Grosse, a committee from the American Humane Society, then holding a convention in Rochester, waited upon the exhibitors' convention and urged the elimination of pictures giving exhibitions of cruelty to animals.

After the adjournment of the convention at 3:30 o'clock the members entered automobiles and were taken to the Eastman Kodak Company's plant, where pictures were taken of the party in group. An hour was profitably spent in a sight-seeing trip through the immense plant.

At eight o'clock Thursday evening the members and their wives attended a banquet served in the dining room of the Rochester Hotel. About one hundred persons sat down to a delectable feast and were further entertained by orchestral and vaudeville numbers and some new pictures provided by the several exchanges in the city. Speeches were made by National President Neff and National Vice-President Sidney Ascher.

The place for the next convention was left for the executive board of the state league to select. In the meantime an organizer will be put to work to induce exhibitors to join the new state league.

Harmony and determination characterized the meeting throughout. The effort on the part of a few members of the bolting organization to create a disturbance during the first day's meeting had not the least effect, while several of the members took grim pleasure in bodily ejecting the disturbers after they persisted in ignoring a polite request to leave the convention hall.

Altogether the convention was a success and was, by far, the best convention of exhibitors that has yet been held in New York State.

Convention Briefs.

J. E. Robin, sales manager for the Precision Machine Company, was on hand with a first run copy of the Simplex. He was a busy boy in his corner of the hotel lobby.

Right next was Will Smith and a latest model Power's projector. Smith was handing out copies of his little booklet, "Hints to Operators." He handed out other hints which contemplated a sale of a Power's 6-A and seemed to have no trouble in getting listeners.

David J. Chatkin, Buffalo representative of Warner's Features, was on hand with a few prints of coming subjects and some good paper. The pictures were very popular.

Everywhere one turned there was a delegate from the Eastman Kodak Company. George A. Blair was responsible for this marshaling of the Kodak forces and they were all strong on the hospitality proposition.

Our old friend, Henry H. Turner, of the Gundlach-Manhattan Optical Company, was present and otherwise accounted for. H. H. is stamping on the "home grounds" when he attends conventions in Rochester and few delegates got away from him. He was attended by Harry Glover, secretary of the company.

There are many fine picture theaters in Rochester and it is one of the writer's regrets that he could not find time to visit some of them. One we must mention—the Lyndhurst. It is on North Avenue and is owned by the Lyndhurst Company, of which Thomas Aspenleiter is president, and is managed by I. W. Salyerds. It is a ground floor house of fireproof construction seating about 1000. Its projecting room is equipped with two Power's machines, motor drive, and in charge of Edward Sims. To give you an idea of the kind of operator Sims is, you might rub any part of those machines with your pocket handkerchief without soiling it. You will have to go some to beat his picture, too. Richardson ought to see that outfit.

While speaking about the success of the Rochester Convention mention must be made of the excellent work done by Clem Kerr, of the National League staff, in preparing the way. Mr. Kerr spent two weeks around Rochester and gave material aid in

New York State League Convention at Rochester, N. Y., formulating plans and gathering the sinews of war. In this field he has been highly successful on a number of previous occasions and Rochester was no exception. Kerr is a good man to have around when a convention is in order.

WASHINGTON PICTURE MEN AT DINNER.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of the District of Columbia Hold First Annual Banquet.

TUESDAY, October 16, was indeed a red letter day in the motion picture circles of the national capital, for it was on this day that the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, of the District of Columbia, held its first annual banquet in the palm room of the Continental Hotel. First off, the banquet hall was beautifully decorated with garlands and bouquets of fall flowers and foliage, the room being fashioned like a huge grape arbor, with myriads of small electric lights twinkling like stars from the ceiling.

The members and guests congregated in the lobby and the rooms set aside for their use, and discussed many of matters pertaining to the motion picture business of Washington. Then came the taking of the flashlight, followed by the signal given by President Herbst for the march to the banquet hall. Then came the surprises. After extending a greeting to the members and the out of town guests, President Herbst paid a glowing tribute to Mr. A. Brylawski, lovingly called "Pop" by his admiring friends for, as President Herbst said, he is one of the pioneers in this city. In responding to the toast in his honor, he said:

"It is with pleasure that I see before me the members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League; something I dreamed of years ago, which might some day occur, but which I never really expected to see. I will go over the little instances that have occurred to make this league. In January, 1910, a little trouble occurred in regard to Sunday operations and six or seven of the exhibitors here got together. One was the late lamented Mr. Chamberlain, the others, Messrs. Noonan, Lyons, Blum and Marks; these, with myself formed a little alliance on the approach of the Sunday law. In 1911 another little organization was formed called the Photo Play Association of Washington. We kept that up for a little while and in March, 1911, Mr. Neff came here from the West as the representative of a real exhibitors' league and a little band consisting of my son, the vice president, and myself got a charter for the city of Washington and the District of Columbia. This charter we kept to ourselves until the fall of 1911 when the foundation was laid for this dinner of tonight. It gives me great pleasure to see so much cordiality and friendship among us; it did not previously exist, and I hope it will continue for many years.

"In the nomination for the presidency of this league, it was an honor for me to name the present incumbent, President Herbst. How he has conducted himself since that time, I leave to the members. He has worked hard and sincerely and it gave me additional pleasure when I was tonight given the delicate task of presenting to him a little remembrance of the respect and esteem in which the members of the league hold him and it is our fond hope to have him with us for many more years."

Mr. Herbst was presented with a handsome watch fob with a locket-charm, on which was embossed the Masonic emblem and having a diamond set at the joint of the compasses. Although nearly overcome with emotion, he responded as soon as he could make himself heard above the applause that followed the presentation.

But the surprises were not over by any means, for Mr. Rover immediately took the floor and paid the following tribute to Washington's little hustler, a son of a hustling father—Fulton M. Brylawski:

"The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of the District of Columbia has had its ups and downs as detailed by our dear friend, 'Pop' Brylawski, but tonight is an occasion when it is 'up.' Now, in the hard work incident to the building up of this league, a welding together of the members, getting them to combine in some unity, there has been another who has been largely instrumental in the success of this get-together evening. The only objection the exhibitors have to this gentlemen is that he has various committees appointed to do various things, then gets himself appointed as chairman of each and does all the work himself. This is due to his zeal to further the interests of the league. This gentleman besides being our secretary is one of the national vice-presidents. He is a man whom we send from one end of the country to the other looking after our interests. Then again, he's the Beau Brummel of the Avenue. We want to give him a little token of our esteem and in doing so to prevent him from spending some of his own money in keeping up his reputation. In making this presentation, I want to say it is with the greatest of pleasure that I present this small token as an appreciation of the good hard work done by Fulton M. Brylawski in our behalf."

This slight token happened to be a beautiful evening vest and an evening shirt to match.

By this time the waiters had brought in something a little more substantial than just talk and the signal was given to "fall to," that the menu might be disposed of and an opportunity given to the guests to hear more pearls of wisdom.

A toast was drunk to the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Maryland and to Messrs. Pearce, Bennett, Wunder and Durkee, its officers.

Secretary Bennett, of Baltimore, made the response, stating that Maryland had always borne the name for being the State of Hospitality, but that he felt as though its place had been justly usurped by Washington. He thanked the members for the courtesy and attention shown his delegation and extended their wishes for the success of the local league.

The diners were then treated to a musical number by Copeland and Walsh, for the Cosmos and the Casino Theaters had sent up to the hotel for the occasion the pick of their vaudeville performers.

The feature of the evening was the talk given by Mr. C. Francis Jenkins, the pioneer inventor of moving pictures, on the growth and development of the business. "For the past ten years or more," said Mr. Jenkins, "we have had a form of dramatic representation which has presented to us every feature of all things entertaining since the beginning of the world. We have had the story teller in pantomime; we have had every form of spectacular reproduction; we have reproduced every form of human emotion known to exist in realism and custom, true to nature. We have multiplied the magic lantern a thousand fold; we bring every country, every strange custom, every new invention, every scientific discovery to the view of the public.

"Sellers was the inventor of the first picture reel that I know anything about. His was a perforated ribbon with a series of pictures. In France, Newbold a few years later produced a similar scheme as did Marie for scientific purposes. Evans and Green in England also produced the perforated ribbon, but none of these have ever commercialized their ideas. It is to the patient investigations of Professor Muybridge, financed by the Leland-Stanford Institute, that we are indebted for moving pictures. These pictures gave classical, animal and muscular motion. In 1880, I think it was, he lectured in California, exhibiting twelve to twenty pictures per second; in 1881 he lectured in France at the Paris Exposition and in 1882 and 1883 in London, New York, Philadelphia and Boston. A set of these priceless photographs can be found in the National Museum and one or two in the University of Pennsylvania. Among my greatest treasures I have a letter from Professor Muybridge, written to me in 1898, in which he says that on February 27, 1888, ten years previous, he presented to Mr. Edison these photographs and suggested they be combined with the phonograph, stating how this could be accomplished.

"In 1893, at the World's Fair, Mr. Auschultz, a Prussian, had several very excellent machines into which one looked to see the pictures. There was a large rotating disk therein representing several phases of motion. This was not a projecting machine.

"Now, my own work commenced about 1880 and 1890, when I came here to Washington. For my first pictures I secured the financial assistance of Mr. Freeman, a protege of Mr. S. Bryan, and signed a contract for this purpose. To my misfortune he died soon after, again leaving me on my own resources. I did not make very rapid progress; you must remember also that at that time motion picture ribbon was not easily obtained; there were only two ways of securing it; one by splicing together the strips sold in the open market for cameras, the other by buying from Mr. Eastman a whole ribbon 50 feet long by 22½ inches wide and there was no inventor having enough money to buy so much.

"At the invitation of your president I exhibited one night before the Camera Club, using a large silk handkerchief for a screen and an oil lamp for illumination. In 1884 I had so far progressed that I used an arc lamp and I gave an exhibition on F Street in October on a large sized canvas. This has since been discovered to have been the initial exhibition. Since that time everyone has been so busy in making money that no change has been made except in the shutter to eliminate flickering."

Mr. Jenkins then told of the electrical school with which he was connected in those early days and of meeting Mr. Thomas Armat, who had been engaged as a lecturer on electricity, with whom he went into partnership. In 1895 he signed a contract with him by which Mr. Armat agreed to finance the construction of some of the machines which had been invented by Mr. Jenkins and three were accordingly made and taken to Atlanta, Ga., and exhibited at the exposition there. "The first stumbling block there met," he said, "was the inability of the spieler hired for the purpose to tell the public just what motion pictures were. It is utterly impossible for you gentlemen to conceive what motion pictures were previous to the time you first saw them. We came to the conclusion that we would obtain better results by inviting the public to witness the exhibition without making them stop at the ticket window. We gave them a five-reel exhibition—each of the reels was 50 feet long. I should say, however, that when we ran off one reel the man would go out in front of the machine and tell the people we had not come to Atlanta for our health and if any in the audience thought they had twenty-five cents' worth of amusement at the conclusion of the show they could leave it at the ticket office on their way out. Our confidence was not misplaced, for nearly everyone who went into that building left the twenty-five cents spoken of. Then one night a fire started in the negro plantation exhibit which oxidized the whole place; ours was the last to be reduced to ashes. This gave us the opportunity of looking over our belongings and discovering our return tickets to Washington. We were both tired and discouraged and susceptible to the talk of our 'friends,' with the result that I had a falling out with Mr. Armat."

He then told of how the machine he had invented had been introduced by Mr. Armat to Mr. Edison, of the introduction of the Edison Vitascope and the establishment of the first moving picture house on the south side of Union Square, in New York City, and the growth of the industry, until now there is invested in it upward of $500,000,000.

In closing, Mr. Jenkins predicted that motion pictures will find their largest field, not in the entertainment line, but in the educational field. "If my prediction is true," he said, "the moving picture business is then really in its infancy."

For several minutes following the conclusion of his remarks the room resounded with the cheers of those who had been carried from the beginning to the present day of motion pictures, the subject being a new one to many.

Mr. Marion S. Pearce, of Baltimore, expressed his gratification at being present, and Mr. Sawin, of the General Film Company, made a few remarks on the "Get together" proposition. During the intervals between the speakers, songs and recitations helped to make the evening pleasant, and the singing of "Oh! You Million Dollar Kid," by one of the lady entertainers caused her to be almost smothered with flowers contributed by the guests.

Mr. Carrick, of the Universal Film Company, stated that his company always stood ready to co-operate with the exhibitors, that they were only too glad to work in perfect harmony with the exhibitors.

"We must realize," said Mr. Carrick, "that the business is now passing through a certain crisis. Mr. Jenkins spoke a few minutes ago of the educational and industrial side of the business. I am afraid I disagree with him. The educational side has been, to a certain extent, neglected, not due to the neglect on the part of the manufacturers but mostly to neglect on the part of school and educational authorities in appropriating funds for the purpose, but the educational part will come and, I may say, is coming in this way—that you are the educational institutions, your theaters are the educational institutions and in that respect you are to a certain extent the censors of the educational operation of your program that comes on your screen and to this end you must look carefully to the pictures that you show and look not merely for the sensational values but the photographic details, the historical character of the picture and various other things.

"I have heard many remarks lately about the growing number of theaters—complaints that the number of theaters is increasing so rapidly as to take away business from other theaters until it will in the end become unprofitable. This, I contend, gentlemen, is wrong. It is not the growth and multiplying of the theaters that is going to take away the profits of the business. You fail to consider that three or four years ago you were attracting to your houses approximately ten per cent. of the population of the city. The pictures were badly worked out, due possibly to lack of funds in manufacturing. Now, the pictures have progressed with rapid strides; pictures are taken with a historical correctness not dreamed of three or four years ago. The moral tone of the pictures has increased one hundred fold. You have attracted in that manner, not the ten per cent. of three or four years ago, but 90 per cent. of the population, for that is the percentage in the United States at the present time of the population which forms the patronage of the moving picture theaters; that is the cause for the number of theaters.

"There is one thing that is certain, there is a tendency on the part of some exhibitors to more or less detract from others. It is a sort of a selfish arrangement by which they strive to gather the people under their own roofs and keep them there indefinitely. They are in some cases showing twenty-five and thirty cents worth for a nickel and that is where the trouble is going to come in. I believe the organization will be able to keep the shows within decent confines."

His remarks were met with cries of "Three reels for five cents," one of the aims of the league being to so limit the shows at the various houses.

Short snappy talks by Messrs. Cunningham, branch manager of the Mutual Film Exchange, and Smiley, of Warner's Features, songs and recitations by the Cosmos and Casino entertainers, and a song by Mr. W. E. Jasper, a member of the league, about concluded the evening's entertainment. The milk men could be heard completing the last lap of their morning's delivery as Auld Lang Syne was sung by all present.

Among those present were William P. Herbst, president; Ira Lamotte, 1st vice-president; V. H. Stonesifer, 2nd vice-president; Fulton Brylawski, secretary; A. C. Joy, treasurer; Thomas M. Eastwood, Joseph Morgan, Harry Crandall, Samuel Greenberg, B. C. Cunningham, Alan Bachrach, Morris Hahn, Harry S. Wolf, A. Brylawski, Julian Brylawski, Lawrence Engel, W. Sawin, F. Osborne, V. R. Carrick, A. Dressner, D. J. O'Brien, G. W. Smiley, C. J. Bedell, Maurice Davis, W. Notes, Maury Herman, Frank Durkee, W. H. Shipman, N. Stein, C. F. Jenkins, J. P. Anderson, Edward Hines, Fred Stein, W. E. Jasper, J. P. Morgan, Leo Rover, J. S. Watson, Moses Coleman, and Marion S. Pearce, Frank Durkee, W. H. Winder, and J. H. Bennett, of Baltimore; Clarence L. Linz, representing the World, and those who contributed to the evening's entertainment in a professional way.

NEFF DOWN EAST.

Following the Rochester convention, President Neff made a trip to Boston, Mass., Portland, Me., and other down east cities in the interest of the league. He held several conferences with league members and exhibitors.

EXPOSITION PROFITS DIVIDED.

Through an oversight an erroneous statement of the division of the profits of the Motion Picture Exposition held last July at Grand Central Palace was published in last week's Moving Picture World, so we make the following correction: The profits accruing from the exposition amounted to $8,295, paid to the New York City exhibitors' Association by the Exposition Company. Out of this amount $2,150 was paid to the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America upon the demand of that organization enforced by a suit brought against the New York City exhibitors who had the affair in charge. Another sum of $600 was paid to the New York State Branch of the National League and $100 was paid to Clem Kerr and L. R. Thomas, organizers, to satisfy their claims against the New York City Association. This settlement was brought about by the suit against the New York City Association in which Mr. L. S. Miller, of Cincinnati, and Tobias Keppler, of New York, were the attorneys for the National League.

NEW EDISON SERIES.

Will Feature Hanshew Detective Stories in Twelve Productions—Ben Wilson in Leading Role.

The Edison Company has completed plans for a new series of twelve pictures, which promised to eclipse anything that has ever been attempted in the way of serial photoplays. The new stories will be released under the general title, "The Chronicles of Cleek." They will be selected from the detective stories by Thomas W. Hanshew, which made such a sensation when published in England.

Ben. F. Wilson.

The Edison people have taken twelve stories best suited for photoplay purposes and will release one on the last Tuesday in the month, beginning November 25th. We are promised something of a highly sensational order—always, of course, with a strong element of mystery. The stories will appear in this country in the Short Story Magazine simultaneously with the release of the film and will be read in the thousands of homes which are included in this popular magazine's extensive circulation. Judging by the success of the Mary pictures, which were also published concurrently by a magazine, the publishing of the story in magazine form gives a tremendous impulse to the interest in the films.

In the first story, "The Vanishing Cracksman," the crook abandons his profession and goes over to the side of the law. In the remaining eleven stories he is engaged in the pursuit of criminals and in the dangerous and all-absorbing problems of unraveling baffling mysteries.

Ben Wilson, one of the most popular players on the screen, will assume the leading role. Mr. Wilson was born in Centerville, Iowa, and has a theatrical experience covering several years in stock companies in Brooklyn, New York and other large cities. He was a member of the famous Spooner Company and was manager of the Park Theater at the time it burned. Among the numerous important engagements which he has played are: Jimsey Smith in "Paid in Full," and one of the leading roles in the famous "Seven Days" Company, in which he made a tremendous hit.

Mr. Wilson has been a member of the Edison photo-players for several years, during which time he has been a member of the various companies which have been sent to Bermuda, Cuba and through the Canadian Rockies. He was also one of the party which spent the Winter of 1912-13 in California. He has played so many leading roles that it is impossible to enumerate them, but he is just now attracting country-wide attention as the hero of the "Who Will Marry Mary?" series.

TRADE PRESS MEN SWITCH.

Joseph W. Farnham, who has been doing motion pictures for the Billboard for the past few months, has resigned and will join the staff of the All-Star Feature Film Company in a responsible capacity.

George D. Procter, for some time past editor of the motion picture supplement of the Morning Telegraph, has joined the editorial staff of the Motion Picture News.

ABE WARNER BACK.

Abe Warner, vice-president and general manager of Warner's Features, has returned from a long Western trip and reports the business outlook to be extremely good for his company. The palatial offices of Warner's Features are still in the hands of the fixture men and will soon be in condition for business. In the meantime the company is occupying temporary offices on the seventh floor of the Leavitt Building on West 46th Street, New York

"The Sea-Wolf"

Adapted for the Screen in Seven Reels from London's Story by Bosworth, Inc.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

I WOULD characterize all of Jack London's stories as pre-eminently filmable. As Mr. Bosworth is even to the most superficial eye peculiarly fitted for impersonating types of the Jack London pen, the combination which makes its bow to us with a seven-reel filming of "The Sea-Wolf" is most propitious. It is a first effort and it is creditable and gives promise of splendid things in the future, but it is not an unqualified success. Even such filmable stories as those of London cannot be allowed to go upon the screen undramatized. The process of adaptation must be a process of elimination, too, and the tendency even in such a picturesque tale, so rich in episode, must be toward simplifying and strengthening the action. In these requirements the present production has not reached perfection, but I am glad to add that everywhere the spectator meets glorious pictures and the subtle touch of the London variety of genius.

Scene from "The Sea-Wolf" (Bosworth, Inc.).

No praise can be too high for the settings and for the photography. The spirit of the ocean, which London conjures with such enviable ease, is on the screen and travels from the screen to the delighted audience. The attention to detail in all nautical matters, the characterization of the types of sailors, who sail in the London stories—and we all know they are true enough sailors and always mighty interesting—leave not the least thing to be desired. I think a word of acknowledgment is likewise due to the cameraman, whose task was a heavy burden. He has done well. The realism for which a London story affords such fine chances is not lacking. It is convincing no less than exciting. Take the accident. It has every appearance of being real, and the cheers the scenes brought forth from a rather critical audience were well deserved.

Far the most difficult part of the whole production was the rendering of the "Sea-Wolf." Mr. Bosworth had the physique and the artistic size required by the part, though in the characterization he was not quite as strong as in the "straight" acting. He seemed in the early part of the story not quite certain of his ground, but as the action advanced to the great dramatic moments he electrified the audience by his masterly portrayals. He does not always succeed in expressing a mood, but a passion he can express according to Shakespeare. He found his footing at the first great dramatic moment and never lost it afterward. It was his acting which was chiefly responsible for the sharp revival of interest toward the end of the story just as the action was beginning to drag.

His support was fair. Viola Barry, the only woman in the story, is conscientious in her work. It would have been better if she had not emerged from the shipwreck with her makeup in a flourishing condition.

I think five reels would have been much better than seven. In saying this I realize very well that the adaptation for the screen may be allowed on a much more generous latitude than an adaptation for the conventional stage. Indeed many of the incidents of the story, though they do not carry the action forward by the fraction of an inch, are entirely welcome to the motion picture audience. What could be more interesting than the rough but good-natured comedy of the sailor folk? The throwing overboard of the cook and "washing" him because of his contempt of sailors' stomachs, the appearance of a man eating shark going in the direction of the unlucky cook and finally the capture of the monster are incidents that add not a little to the charm and the general effect of the story. Other scenes, however, were painfully superfluous. The lingering of the poet and the critic on Endeavor Island was altogether too long and the action in the last thousand feet could have been fully brought out in less than five hundred feet without the least danger of crowding. The trips to the boat and the final incidents on it might profitably have been cut even at the risk of cutting the story itself. These and other scenes that might be mentioned in different parts of the production have not enough humorous or spectacular value to allow them to detract from the central theme of the story.

The motion picture art is in a fair way to profit by further screen adaptations of the London stories. I predict that in his second venture Mr. Bosworth will touch perfection. He has the ability and he has the ambition which is justified and useful only as it is supported by ability. There was a lavish expenditure of money in the production, an item that counts for much when the money is expended judiciously, as it was in the present case. Every friend of the good motion picture will hail the present and the future work of Mr. Bosworth with sincere joy. We cannot have enough good, clean, thrilling pictures of adventures at sea and in strange lands.

"The Queen's Jewel"

A Thriller by Itala That Will Make the Audience Jump.

By H. C. Judson.

THERE is no room for doubt that the most recent Itala three-reel offering will enjoy a remarkable success as a thrilling melodrama. It brought this reviewer up out of his seat and he, surely, thought himself proof. To begin with, it is a very well staged picture with excellent scenes in a royal palace and fine scenes outdoors. The actors, too, do their parts with all the skill necessary so that the picture has no particular weaknesses to discount its exciting story in any way.

All plots have been used. This one is the well known "queen's jewel" plot. Dumas' story, "The Three Musketeers" is also a queen's jewel story; it has been called the best novel ever written and probably is. You will remember that the queen needed a jewel; she had given it to the Duke of Buckingham, and Richelieu, with the purpose of destroying her influence, so arranged things that the king ordered her to wear it at a ball. It was the doughty musketeer, lover of the queen's lady in waiting, who undertook to get the jewel and succeeded in spite of all the great cardinal could do to prevent it. That is also the story told by the picture; but it is a thoroughly modern story with flying machines, motor cars, bicycles and fast trains. It has, moreover, an individual touch, here and there, of humor and modern understanding that makes it amusing in places, as well as thoroughly exciting, for the incidents have been pictured in a remarkably convincing way.

The modern setting of this picture changes the story from that told by Dumas markedly, of course. The things the villainous prime minister does to keep the bird-man from getting the jewel back in time for the queen to wear it at the ball, were dictated by the fact the hero had so many ways of getting over the ground quickly. In the last reel, it becomes a chase picture; but it is as well done and as exciting as any chase picture I have ever seen; and I have seen very good ones before this. The scenes through which the chase passes are full of interest and the author of the story is unusually fertile in inventing predicaments into which the pursuers chase their quarry, and the clever expedients used by him in escaping from one after another of these. They are full of the unexpected. The spectator is caught in the middle of a hearty laugh by a new event that makes him hold his breath for the moment. It makes high-class entertainment surely and is commendable for all kinds of audiences.

UNIVERSAL EXCHANGE ELECT OFFICERS.

At a meeting held recently, officers and directors were elected for the Universal Film Exchanges with offices at 1600 Broadway and Fourteenth Street, New York, to serve the ensuing year. Carl Laemmle was elected president; David Horsley, vice-president, and Mark M. Dintenfass, secretary and treasurer by the newly elected directors composed of Carl Laemmle, Mark M. Dintenfass, David Horsley P. A. Powers and William H. Swanson.

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADE

Picture Theaters for Children Must Come.

MAJOR M. L. C. FUNKHOUSER, second deputy superintendent of police, whose work is chiefly concerned with the moral conditions prevailing in the city, referred to "animal dancing" in the public halls and moving pictures in a speech at a luncheon, at the Chicago Engineers' Club, Thursday, October 16.

"Animal dancing" is the worst enemy of morality in Chicago, the major declared, and in close connection with that statement he charged that moving pictures instill criminal instincts in the minds of many children. These statements he based on information gathered since his appointment last March.

It is the major's intention to form a committee of seventy-five business men, who are expected to form a standard for the censorship of moving pictures. The members of the committee will be required to devote three hours each week to viewing pictures in the special theater, in the city hall, for several months, and thus arrive at the desired standard.

"It is difficult to establish a standard of moving pictures," he said. "In that work we need the aid of citizens whose children are to see the films. Persons who take their children to the motion picture theaters are more able to judge what their children should see than are the police.

"We refuse now to permit the showing of pictures exploiting crime, ridiculing constituted authority, or showing the degradation of women.

"The film makers have learned that, and those pictures are not sent here. But there are other pictures which might not fall in those three classes, which should be suppressed for the sake of children.

"Complaints have come to me from settlement workers that all the work they do with the foreign children in the way of education and civilization is undone by the gunplay pictures and the pictorial stories of broken homes.

"A film has an educational value. The other day, two women on the South Side complained to a theater manager about the pictures he was showing. He told them the people wanted them. The women took the theater for a week and made twice as much as he. They showed the Joliet steel works, lumber mills, and other educational features."

The major said forty per cent. of the patronage of motion picture theaters is from the children of the city.

Major Funkhouser is known as a fair and liberal-minded man. He is thoroughly sincere in discharging the duties of his office intelligently and well; but I am of the opinion that the proposed form of censorship would be inequitable from the very start. Adults must not be classed with children in the matter of entertainment. Many of the best film classics would be rejected under the proposed standard.

Some time ago I referred to the same subject and concluded that there must be children's programs and programs for adults. This problem can be solved only by having theaters devoted to children in various sections of the city. These theaters should be sufficient in number and in well-selected localities, so that all the children of the city can attend without traveling great distances. These theaters will easily advertise themselves. The adult theaters can take care of themselves.

The exhibitors must work out their own salvation in some such way.

Among Chicago Exhibitors.

At the regular semi-monthly meeting of exhibitors in Masonic Temple, Monday, October 20, several important questions were discussed. The scale adopted and submitted by moving picture operators was considered and pronounced satisfactory by all concerned.

The meeting in the city hall, set for Friday, October 17, and at which it was intended to have a hearing of the ventilation question, was postponed until Friday, October 24. On that date a special hearing will be given the health department and the exhibitors by the building committee of the city council. Each party in the controversy will be represented by counsel and experts, and it is hoped that a modification of the ventilation ordinance will be arrived at that will put an end to the present conflict.

Health Commissioner Young, however, bears the banner "No surrender," and he is backed by certain ladies who are always active in so-called reform movements. No other matter will be taken up at this meeting, in order that a decision may be reached as soon as possible.

Chicago exhibitors are fully aware of the necessity for good ventilation in their theaters, and they are ready and willing to conform to any reasonable measure towards that end; but they are unwilling to submit, without legal contest, to an arbitrary measure that means large outlays without compensating benefits.

Alaskans "Call" Emerson Hough.

Emerson Hough, the well-known author who recently returned from a trip from the frozen north, on which he was accompanied by B. K. Miller, a millionaire sportsman of Milwaukee; James K. Cornwall, member of Parliament at Ottawa for Alberta; G. B. Frazer, a half breed Indian, and C. A. Luperti, an expert Essanay camera man, has raised the ire of Alaskans by a recent interview with a St. Paul newspaper man, in which he is reported as saying: "I could go to better hunting grounds ten hours out of St. Paul than in all Alaska. Why, I could guarantee to take a man wearing a silk hat and patent leather pumps over this trail (the Rat Portage trail) and to land him safe and sound in Dawson without a scratch to mar the polish on either."

A Dawson Daily News man spits venom at Mr. Hough's statements in the following words:

"Emerson Hough happened to travel through a thin strip of country along the much frequented routes and did not get five miles off the beaten paths of the McKenzie or the Yukon, and then has the audacity to slap the Northland. He floated down the McKenzie River, followed the old trail to the Porcupine, thence descended that well-known stream and ascended the Yukon by steamer. Thence he took rail to the coast and returned to St. Paul.

"If he is correctly quoted, he cannot be too severely rebuked for hair-trigger tongue methods. More people are needed to build this empire, and men who have access to the public prints should be most jealous to see that they are not trapped by irresponsible writers into making statements that will injure the reclamation of these outlying territories.

"Emerson Hough traveled a beaten path, a circuit where game is not to be expected. Had he gone a mile or two off that route he would have found game in abundance. He was scarcely past Dawson when word came that thousands of caribou were trekking through the hills fifteen to thirty miles west of Dawson and crossing the government road to Glacier Creek. Dawsonites by the score went there in a day or less, and every man brought back game.

"Stampeders returning from Chisana report ptarmigan everywhere on the many trails so thick they can be killed with sticks. Moose are plentiful on all the streams tributary to the upper Yukon and bears are numerous on the old gold streams, as well as elsewhere in the territory.

"Game is so plentiful in Yukon that a vast portion of every day's sales of meat in the markets is game. The restaurants of Dawson find game so common and cheap it sells for much less than beef, mutton, pork, chicken or turkey. This is the case the year round.

"The inexpensive orders in local restaurants always are those for caribou, moose and game birds. Emerson Hough was here and ate in Dawson restaurants and saw the menus and knows this to be the case.

"Since he did not stop in Dawson long enough to walk beyond shouting distance of the town and since he hurried through the Northland like a scared wolf, he should be more modest in making his statements to the outside world.

"It's a long way from Dawson to St. Paul and Chicago, but men who go there needn't think they can make reckless statements and see the bladerdash go unchallenged."

All of which tends to show that the Arctic regions have been brought close to our doors, and that the sound of a voice in St. Paul can be easily heard in Dawson. Since Mr. Hough made the trip with the object of making Northern solitudes a setting for one or more stories, and possibly a moving picture scenario or two, the appearance of these will be awaited with considerable

Photoplay Actress Disfigured by Leopard.

A recent cable dispatch from Rome to the Chicago Tribune states that Adriana Costamagna, an actress, was badly bitten and clawed by a leopard while posing for a classical scene in a Bioscope picture the other day.

The keepers, standing by, did not use their revolvers, as they were afraid of hitting the woman. They turned the hose on the leopard, but without effect. Finally they succeeded in getting a chain around the animal and dragged him away.

Miss Costamgana was taken to a hospital, where it is said she will recover. Her face and arms, however, will be disfigured permanently.

Chicago Film Brevities.

H. A. Rubens, owner of the Crystal Stair Theater and the Princess, Joliet, called at the World office last week. He stated that the Princess, a new house, seating 1,200 people on the main floor, was opened about two months ago and has been steadily doing fine business ever since with licensed service. Mr. Rubens contracted for the General Film Co.'s exclusive service beginning Monday, October 13, being the first signer on the G. F. Co.'s books, his name being on page No. 1 and bill No. 1. Mr. Rubens says that the first week's result at the Princess from exclusive service points to bigger business than ever. A three-reel program at five cents is offered at the Princess. There are no singers. Instrumental music is furnished by an organ, a piano and drums. The Crystal Stair also offers three reels for five cents and is doing well.

T. W. May, owner of the Admiral Theater, 4710 Indiana Ave., paid a visit to the World office last week and renewed his subscription for that paper. The Admiral seats 800 people and Mutual programs are used. Mr. May is an old theatrical man. For the past 10 years he was advance agent for the Fields and Primrose minstrels, and is better known among the profession as Ted May. Mr. May took hold of the Admiral July 19th last, and is playing to standing room every night, notwithstanding the fact that it was a "lemon" before he took charge.

J. J. Bennell, managing director of the "B. B." pictures, whose company owns three large film exchanges in Glasgow, Edinburgh, and London, and 16 picture theaters in Scotland, was seen in London by Wm. N. Selig on his recent visit to that metropolis. Mr. Bennell warmly invited Mr. Selig to his home in Glasgow, where he assured him of the most hospitable treatment as long as he desired to stay. It will be remembered Mr. Bennell, accompanied by Mrs. Bennell, made an extensive trip through the United States and Canada last summer, stopping over quite a time in Chicago, where they met all the prominent people in the film industry. Mr. Bennell requested Mr. Selig to convey his kindest regards and best wishes to all these friends and acquaintances.

Exhibitors using license service are much pleased with the three days advance posters for regular releases, the use of which went into effect near the close of the week ending Saturday, October 18. Seven one-sheet posters are offered for 50 cents by the American Slide & Poster Co., which has head offices in the First National Bank Building, and a sub-office in each branch of the General Film Co. in Chicago. The three days advance system prevents undue competition by exhibitors in the advance display of coming features. The American Slide & Poster Co. requires that the posters must be returned in good condition after using.

Sparks from crossed wires in the Kedzie Theater, 3204 Kedzie Ave., caused someone to shout fire Friday night, October 17. The audience of about 600 men, women and children arose in a panic, but were immediately quieted by the manager. No one was injured.

Miss Francis A. Clark, a sixteen-year-old piano player in a moving picture theater in New Castle, Ind., recently saved 200 women and children from being trampled to death during a panic in the theater. A film caught fire in the house and when smoke poured from behind the curtain, the people rose in panic. Miss Clark sang popular airs to ragtime and shouted to the excited audience to mark time to her music. This they did and everyone got out safely. After the fire was over Miss Clark fainted.

The Argmore Theater, Argyle St. and Kenmore Ave., in the center of the exclusive North Side residence section, will be opened Saturday evening, October 25. The owner and manager is N. W. Aaronson, who was manager of the College Inn for years, where he made the acquaintance of every prominent theatrical man and Chicagoan of note. The Argmore will show high-class license pictures and will charge 10 cents admission

Baron Francis B. Von Teuber, who is also entitled to M. D. after his name, wired from Kingston, Jamaica, last week to the Selig Polyscope Co. that the baroness had presented him with a 10-pound boy. The baroness will remain in Kingston while the baron completes his trip through Guatemala in the interests of the Selig Polyscope Co. Thereafter he will make a journey of over 3,000 miles up the Amazon, to Amazonia, and will rejoin his family in Rio de Janeiro February, 1914. Baron Von Teuber's trip through South America has altogether to do with business of the Selig Polyscope Co.

George Magie, formerly connected with the Pilot and Solax Companies, and recently traveling representative of the Universal Film Manufacturing Co., now has headquarters at the old Standard Film Exchange, this city. Mr. Magie has been appointed district manager of the Universal for the Middle West. Will Hopp will continue manager of the Standard and Mr. Harthil, assistant manager, under Universal control.

"THE MESSAGE OF THE DEAD" (Eclectic).

This is a three-reel production of the melodramatic class. There is said to be a distinctive demand for melodrama in the pictures which claim is granted, but the kind of melodrama, whether it be given on the screen or on the speaking stage, that succeeds is that which possesses the merit of a consistent plot well portrayed. In this particular picture some of the situations are forced and the action is not as smooth as we are accustomed to these days. Passing these defects there is much in the subject to hold the attention and stimulate interest, so that, taken with the other picures of its class "The Message of the Dead" is above the average.

Regarding the photography and settings there are some excellent effects shown in this picture which, in a measure, overcome its defects. The story told relates to the trials of a French peasant, a woodcutter, who is unjustly accused of the murder of an old man who has befriended him. The crime was committed by the old man's nephew and the instrument used is an axe which the woodcutter inadvertently left behind him when calling on the old man concerning a loan. The victim of the crime lived long enough to write an accusation against his nephew and give it to a young boy whom he had adopted, but the boy's mind is unsettled by the horror of the crime and he hides the accusing message. The woodcutter is sent to prison for the murder and his little daughter becomes a vagabond.

Ten years later the woodcutter is paroled from prison and discovers his daughter and the boy living in a hut. The real murderer returns to the scene of his crime about this time and attempts to drive the woodcutter away. One day he chances upon the demented boy, who still guards the book containing the evidence of his crime and endeavors to gain possession of it, but fails. He next incites the villagers to burn the hut in which the woodcutter, his daughter and the demented boy have taken refuge. In the excitement that follows the poor boy's mind is restored and he produces the evidence that fastens the crime upon the real murderer, who is then arrested.

PRESS SHEET FOR "ARIZONA."

There comes to this office a printed sheet that conjures up memories of days "on the road" in other times than these. It is the "press sheet" for the film production of "Arizona," put out by the All Star Feature Corporation. It is just the kind of sheet that the old press agent used to carry in his grip to pass out to the country editors, containing the old familiar line, "Will Exhibit at————," etc., to be filled in for local use, accompanied by a bunch of "comps" for the same purpose. Knowing him to be a former knight of the road, it is possible to discern therein the fine Italian hand of Harry R. Raver, who is now the president of the All Star

A New Talking Picture Device

A Los Angeles Inventor Comes Forward with a Simple Method of Obtaining Perfect Synchronism.

By Hugh Hoffman.

THERE was a demonstration in New York recently of a newly invented apparatus for synchronizing the moving picture and the phonograph. The device is the creation of Mr. O. E. Kellum, of Los Angeles, California; an intelligent and courteous gentleman who has an excellent knowledge of electricity.

There is no doubt of the absolute synchronization obtained with this mechanism. It accomplishes more precise results with less complicated machinery than any other that has come to our notice. So far, it is the only synchronizer, with the exception of Gaumont's, by which the projecting machine is controlled by or from the phonograph. This is done by a combination of well known mechanical expedients, in the employment of which the inventor has shown plenty of good common sense.

The phonograph is operated by batteries. The central pin through the disc record is stout and has a small bevel gear at its apex. Connecting with this pin, by a corresponding bevel gear, is a horizontal rotating rod which at its other end forms the axis ot a commutator. This commutator is divided into six independent parts, in order to form a make-and-break circuit. From the commutator the current goes by cable to the projecting machine. Underneath the projector is a set of six oscillating steel cylinders with plungers or piston rods. These piston rods are connected to a horizontal driving shaft which turns a corner by bevel gear and extends up to the drive shaft of the projector mechanism, where it connects again by bevel gear.

The bottoms of these cylinders are heavily magnetized by a reciprocating solenoid motor, with energy supplied from an ordinary 110 volt socket. These cylinders are wired so that only one of them at a time is magnetized. Each one of the six cylinders is connected to one of the six divisions of the commutator back by the phonograph. In short, there are six complete circuits which are successively made and broken as the commutator revolves. This magnetizes each cylinder in turn, and in turn each cylinder does its work, which is to pull its plunger down to the bottom. The plungers are all connected to the driving shaft, which is a six-throw crankshaft, so that each piston rod gives the drive shaft one sixth of a turn. In other words, all six of the pistons must work one after the other to make the driving shaft turn once around.

This action, while similar in appearance to that of an automobile engine, is really just the reverse. The gas explosion in the automobile cylinder forces the piston out. With the magnetizing process the magnet draws the piston in. The result in each case is the same; the pistons turn the driving shaft and the driving shaft does the work. With Mr. Kellum's device it is mechanically impossible for the projector to go faster or slower than the phonograph turns the commutator.

There is, of course, a common starting point on the film and the record. These are placed in position by their respective operators. No further handling is necessary so far as the mechanism is concerned. The projection operator has only to watch his light and get his next film ready, while the phonograph operator has nothing to do but get out his next record. On the all important question of broken film or patched film, Mr. Kellum frankly admitted that whatever is taken out of a film must be replaced, either by a corresponding piece of positive film or blank film. It is possible also to slow down the projector to allow the phonograph to catch up. This is done by manipulating the commutator. In passing, it may also be added that there are six condensers, one connected to each division of the commutator. These condensers are there to keep the commutator from sparking. Perhaps our description would be more understandable if this commutator had been referred to as a revolving circuit-breaker, which it really is. Its action is identical to that of rotary devices used to operate animated electric signs.

Now for the meat in nut. The Moving Picture World admits that perfect synchronization is possible. The world at large is prepared to admit it. Mr. Kellum's device, along with one or two others, accomplishes this result beyond a doubt. After that—what? This brings us back to our lengthy discussion of the subject in the issue of June 28, last. We have no intention of republishing what was stated at that time. It will suffice to say that the subject matter of the pictures and records is the greatest drawback to the talking picture at the present time. Inventors have shown us that the scheme is feasible. We believe it. Now let them show us something better than small time vaudeville.

Some talking picture men set great store by the fact that their records and films are made simultaneously. They cite that fact against other talking picture processes that make the records and films at different times. That is undoubtedly an advantage in a way but they do not utilize their advantage; they take records of small-time vaudeville acts the same as the others do. Simultaneous records are all right as human documents, but so far as entertainment goes, it is a question whether the exhibitor or the public cares a hang whether the records and films are taken at the same time or not, just so they get the results. When the talking picture people give the public something worth looking at the public will respond quickly enough.

This is not said to disparage Mr. Kellum's invention. He is not a wealthy man and did not have the facilities to show anything in the way of artistic results. But he did show perfect synchronism, obtained in a very ingenious way. His machine is a wonder. He deserves the highest success and he will attain it if he will only give the public something worth while.

CECELIA LOFTUS AMONG FAMOUS PLAYERS.

The Famous Players' Film Company has engaged Cecelia Loftus to appear in the popular novel and famous play, "A Lady of Quality," by Frances Hodgson Burnett. A more suitable subject for Miss Loftus' mimic powers could not have been selected. Cecelia Loftus began her dramatic career under the direction of Daniel Frohman, abandoning a vaudeville income of $2,500 a week to accept a much smaller salary in order to acquire dramatic experience under Mr. Frohman's guidance. In two years she had succeeded so capably that Mr. Frohman made her leading woman with E. H. Sothern, then under his management. By a happy coincidence, as in the case of James K. Hackett, Miss Loftus returns to Mr. Frohman's direction under vitally new conditions, through the medium of the motion picture.

RICHARDS AND FLYNN IN NEW YORK.

Messrs. E. E. Richards and N. J. Flynn, of Kansas City, Missouri, who comprise the Richlynn Amusement Company of that city, were World callers recently. At present they have a circuit of three houses in Kansas City, namely, The Wonderland, The Subway, and the Richlynn. They also have one house in Chicago. When asked if they contemplated breaking into New York they admitted that there seem to be plenty of opportunities here for high class straight moving picture houses. They are the type of exhibitors that continually endeavor to improve on present conditions.

BRITISH NOTES.

(Special Correspondence to the World.)

DESCRIBED in this column a few weeks ago was an invention whereby a vocal accompaniment could be secured for moving pictures in perfect synchronization to the image on the screen but without the use of any gramaphonic attachment. I learned recently that the apparatus, upon careful investigation by the Clarendon Co., has proved to be of such practical value that they have bought up the sole British rights. Apparently the great point in the apparatus is the perfected synchronizer which permits of the enunciation of the words of a photoplay by a speaker who, presumably, would be behind the screen.

The recent leaderettes in the "Moving Picture World" on the multiplicity of lurid "legitimate" stage plays are equally applicable to this country. It is still a vexing problem with exhibitors why such a film as "Sapho" should be censored, while touring companies in provincial cities should produce, among others: "A White Slave" (two companies touring), "In the Grip of the White Slaver," "White Slave Life," "A White Slave Victim," "A White Girl Slave," and "The White Slave Traffic."

Col. W. N. Selig returned from his Continental tour recently but was only in London a day before leaving for America. I interviewed him through his obliging agent, Mr. E. H. Montagu, and found that Mr. Selig, although characteristically optimistic concerning the future of the industry over here, considers the London theaters do not cater sufficiently for the masses, the admission fees in most cases being to high and the programs too long. "W. N. S." thinks the equivalents of six and twelve cents all that should be charged and for this an hour or an hour and a half program should be given. He does not think the moving picture theater will ever oust the regular theater with the better classes, but with the working and middle classes it should certainly hold its own if worked on these lines.

Since the announcement by the Universal Co. of America, that henceforth they would—in conjunction with the Imp Film Co.—handle their own releases in this country, no time has been lost in establishing suitable headquarters. A handsome building in Oxford St., immediately opposite a famous restaurant, has been acquired and named "Universal House," while the name of the company is to be the Trans-Atlantic Film Co. The British organization is for the sale of films only and in future all Imp, Powers, Rex, Bison 101, Nestor, Gem, Victor, Frontier, and Crystal brands will emanate from the foregoing address.

There is also a prospect of early changes at Wesfilm House, the home of the Western Import Co., who control the English business of several other American manufacturers, notably, Keystone, Broncho, Punch, Thanhouser, K-B., Majestic, and Reliance. A change is necessitated, I understand, owing to the desire of the manufacturers of the two last named brands to establish an agency of their own and it is perhaps in connection with this that Mr. Roy Aitken leaves for New York this week end.

Kalem's "From Manger to Cross" has been prohibited from Sunday exhibition at Ramsgate. This is the first instance, so far as this country is concerned, where this production has been barred.

The first provincial moving picture exhibition in Great Britain is now being held in Manchester on similar but much smaller lines than the one in the metropolis earlier in the year and is described by rival trade journals as "a disappointing show" and "a comprehensive display." I visited the exhibition myself on two different days and at all times found it well patronized by the general public in addition to a goodly percentage of the trade. Of the American agencies exhibiting, the Selig Co. occupy the most imposing stand of the entire exhibition. Most of the others are content to be represented conjointly by local agencies, a policy open to much comment since moving picture theaters are proportionately more populous around Manchester than in any other district in Great Britain. Another exhibition has been arranged at Newcastle to open January 14th.

Messrs. Pathe are making a bold endeavor to secure the co-operation of moving picture theaters in an ambitious educational scheme. They propose to release each week, beginning October 23rd, a special educational program of films of an hour's duration on the screen and to continue this over three terms of thirteen weeks each.

The Nottingham Guardians are arranging for paupers in the local workhouse to visit "the pictures" periodically.

AN ENGLISH TRADE REPRESENTATIVE.

Mr. P. Kimberly, managing director of the Imperial Film Co., Ltd., of London, England, has been looking over the film market in this country and was a caller at the New York office of the Moving Picture World last week. He confessed that this was his first visit to the States. He is one of the best known film salesmen in England and is thoroughly posted in regard to all our American brands. Evidently a keen and close student of conditions and values, added to a fine frank personality, and many years of experience made him a representative of the trade that we were indeed glad to meet.

Will S. Rising, the Dean of Moving Picture Actors.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

THE fall season for the motion picture business is now in full sway with everybody connected with it happy over present conditions and equally jubilant over forecasts for the future. The surprising feature of the situation is that such general satisfaction should prevail in view of the competition created by the constant increase in the number of well financed producers of pictures and the number of productions on an elaborate scale. At no time in the history of the business have the operations approached the present magnitude, and more new concerns are perfecting details to enter the field. It is said that all the money centers of the country are supplying financial backing, either directly or indirectly. whenever responsible people can show them that a fair profit can be obtained from investments in a producing plant or a theater. Wall street funds are said to be on tap at all times and the investors do not seem to want any steel-bound guarantee. Their confidence in the business makes them willing to "take a chance."

A well known financier stated recently that the "movies" have almost reached the quotation stage. The time is drawing near when the certificates will be issued to stockholders in the pools that are made up to finance the various undertakings and chains of theaters will be established upon a basis similar to that upon which the chains of restaurants are now operated throughout the country. This development, however, will not be of a mushroom character. A large amount of Wall street money has been lost in various ventures connected with the motion picture business and caution will be exercised with regard to future investments. "The wonderful growth of the business," said the financier, "has opened the eyes of men who have the funds for investment and many of them have unbounded confidence in its future; but they are guarding against any undertakings that may bear color of wild cat mining schemes. Already corps of experts are at work in all parts of the country securing data as to values of locations, cost of erection and, equipping houses, the box office revenues of places now in operation and approximate net profits on each house. Considerable data is already in hand and information comes from one source that it is very gratifying, but much will depend on developments between the present time and the close of the winter season. One of the developments that has influenced these investors is the demoralized condition of the regular theater business. The old-time managers frankly admit that 'the movies have our goat' and they are getting into the field whenever an opportunity affords. Real action on the part of the financial interests may be delayed for months, and possibly for a year or more, but it is coming. That some exhibitors claim they are not making a living out of their places will not delay action. It is counterbalanced by other facts. Investors are increasing daily, houses are growing in numbers, and the interests now at work do not figure on a basis that each house must afford the proprietor a living. They figure chiefly on two things: First, stability of the investment; second, the estimated net profits on the entire circuit of theaters. As previously stated, the scheme in mind is similar to that controlling the restaurant interests. Thousands of individuals see erected on or next to sites where they have failed, palatial structures the individuals could not afford to erect or operate."

The outlook is not an encouraging one for the individual exhibitor, but it is a stubborn fact which he must face with as much grace as possible. In these capitalistic days the investing hawk is soaring over all fields of profit and none escape his watchful eye. So the small exhibitor should bend his efforts to one aim—make hay while he can. To do this he must give his house the best of attention and give his patrons the best show the revenue will permit; and when he sees additional investment will increase his business he should not fail to make it. Many exhibitors are disposed to leave well enough alone; others figure that the less it costs to operate the place the more they can make, regardless of the desires of patrons. The man who strives to make his place valuable will not feel the blow as keenly as his less ambitious fellow exhibitor, should the capitalistic hawk pounce upon him.

One of the chief topics discussed by those now actively engaged in the motion picture business is the multiplicity of long subjects. Two and three reel plays are now being turned out almost as rapidly and with the same regularity as one reel plays were placed upon the market a year ago. It is not surprising that exhibitors sometimes feel that the field of ideas will soon be exhausted, and the increase of still larger subjects has caused many to exclaim "Is there to be no limit?

A well known producer is authority for the statement that the situation will gradually adjust itself and that ere long three reels will be the maximum number for any one subject. He adds that, contrary to the judgment of some producers, one reel subjects still retain popularity with a large percentage of the patrons. Shopping people are great lovers of pictures and if there is an attractive house in the vicinity they prefer spending a while there when waiting for friends, or for a train, rather than loitering in the waiting rooms of the stores. Their stay in the shows, as a rule, is short and they like the one reel on that account. Marcus Loew is one of the foremost of managers to realize this, although he was as tardy in doing so as he was to realize the wisdom of having all first runs in his Herald Square Theater. The house is located in the heart of a large retail shopping district. He is now putting on five reels of first run service at a slight advance of general admission. The shoppers who visit that house will now see five complete subjects never before produced and the management will no longer be annoyed by complaints from the visitor from Jaytown that he "saw that picture before I left hum." There can be no doubt that the results at Mr. Loew's house will show that the one reel, with the proper punch and snap, more than holds its own.

Two and three reel subjects will remain in the field indefinitely if the producers exercise good judgment in their preparation. The rock they must avoid is padding. A few nights ago the writer stood in front of a picture house when two ladies, regular patrons of the place, walked up and inspected the posters displayed at the entrance. "What is that play ——— two reels?" asked one. "Whose make it is?" After reading the poster she added, "I saw one of their two reel plays the other night and it dragged awfully. Let us go to ——— and see what they have." The writer went into the theater and found the two-reel subject a good one. The management was told of what the lady had said in front of the house and the reply made was, "Well, I guess she was right. The subject she referred to was stretched out. It would have made a beautiful one reel, but the merits were killed by tedious action in an effort to make it a feature. All pictures cannot be winners, but the people who come here will not listen to that line of argument, particularly when I announce the subject as a winner. If it fails to come up to the mark the patrons reprimand me the next night by going to my competitor. It is one of the ups and downs of the business we must contend with. I don't get sore every time it happens, but I lose my temper when I see a deliberate piece of padding. The producers should carefully inspect every two or three reels from all standpoints. They should not only review the settings and photography, but sit as an audience and see if the action will hold the interest of the majority of the people. They want to have a good story well told, regardless of the time it takes to tell it. With one reel subjects conditions are different. The effects of a poor reel may be wiped out by one or more following it and you have a chance to send the audience away satisfied."

It is common for exhibitors to complain that rain has interfered with their business and the statement is accepted without question; and yet rain is a harvest promoter at times and in certain places. One night last week the usual Broadway crowd was promenading in the vicinity of Thirty-fourth street when a sudden fall of rain came. Many people were without umbrellas and there was a rush for the moving picture theaters. Every one was filled to capacity.

Where the interest of a business as a whole is at stake a little well-intended criticism cannot cause offense. In the last issue of the Moving Picture World appeared a photograph sent in by a manager to show the popularity of his house as an amusement place for children. It reflected a good piece of management in having the boys seated on one side of the main aisle and the girls on the other. Unfortunately the enthusiastic manager had the photograph taken when the main aisle was also crowded with children. Oversights of this character place in the hands of yellow journals and others, fresh material for the periodical onslaughts upon motion picture houses. Keep the aisles clear at all times.

Home Stuff.

VERY evidently a prophet is not without honor save in his own country. From the far west managers offer the perfectly safe hope that we'll drop in on them some day, but while we echo the hope, there is small chance that we'll get that far from New York for some time. Our next door neighbor asked us over to his airdome recently, but it was just by accident that we picked up a program of the Photoplay Advertiser, printed by the Highway Casino, Kings Highway, near Coney Island Avenue, about three blocks from the place where we sleep in the brief intervals when we do sleep. It came to us on a Thursday when we had two split reel Lubins the night before and just naturally would have brought the whole family down to see Her Present and His Reward if someone had taken notice that we live in a two-family house and that the program went upstairs to filter back the day after it happened. At that we have Doing Like Daisy on the Saturday program and it looks as though the Casino would be in about forty cents for us, the Mrs. and our brother and sister-in-law. All of which is equivalent to saying that the house to house distribution of programs is not worth a lot unless it reaches every family. In this particular case one program only was left to a two-family house and the family upstairs got it first. The head of the family downstairs had written three of the plays listed and would have been glad to come—and bring the family upstairs—if he had seen the program in time.

Not So Bad.

And it is by no means a bad program at that, a great deal better than some of their earlier advertising we have seen. It runs eight pages with a colored cover, and devotes a whole page to the Vitagraph people as well as Monday night, when it is all Vitagraph, the studio being about half a mile away. One fault is that when we saw that the program for Wednesday night included a full split reel of ours, we had to turn back to the front page to find out what Wednesday night was being talked about. It would be just as easy and almost as cheap to say Program for Wednesday, October 15th, as to say Program for Wednesday Night. If the cover ever gets torn off the program you don't know whether it is last Wednesday, this Wednesday or next Wednesday. Maybe it doesn't make much difference, and then, again, it might. To get out a program argues enterprise. To get it around properly argues intelligence—which is a much more rare factor. There is plenty of advertising and the program looks prosperous, but knowing the territory, we feel that the house could do much more if it went after all the business. It may have all it wants, but it is a good advertisement to keep people waiting sometimes, or even turn them back. You don't want to wander over the unrestricted ground, but it is human nature to want to climb the fence.

Be Specific.

And be careful about dates. Put the day and the date over each program section. Don't make the reader turn back. Unless he is especially interested he may not take the trouble. Wednesday, October 15th, may cost a few cents more to set than the standing Program for Wednesday Night, but it may bring in enough ten cent pieces to pay for the change in type. It's worth gambling a few cents on composition, but if you are a building contractor and not a manager such things may not occur to you. The moral is, do not be a building contractor and run a house unless you are also a manager. If you are not a manager get someone who is. We think that this program would be better if it gave a line or two in six point to each release. It is more trouble than the mere list of titles, but if it is trouble to bring in the money, why get out a program at all? And if you do get one out see that everyone gets it. Don't make a selective distribution or you may lose the man who might come—as in this case—and get the man who will not. And if the Dorchester sends out a program we'd be glad to see that, too. The Smith Street cars cut down the distance.

Some Classic.

We think the line from the Rubiayat has been used in this paper before, but not in this column, but the Elite Theater, Weeping Water, Neb., used the line

* * * a moving row
Of Magic Shapes that come and go

from the celebrated effusion of the late Omar, that is particularly applicable to the photoshow. It uses a four-page weekly program that gives a lot in a little space because they know how to make the space work for them. The back page goes to a piano house, which leaves them but four pages, but they make good use of the four pages. They do one thing that very few houses do. They play up certain films and leave the rest to titles. The space does not afford room for a detail of each reel. It may be that they play up only those they know, but the answer is that they make some headlines; enough to keep things going, and dismiss the rest with a line. And they do not tell all of the story. They give you a hint and leave you to guess the rest. To give the entire story spoils the anticipation. To skip the climax leaves something to the audience once it is in the house. Pique curiosity, do not satisfy it, and you still leave something to develop once the crowd is in. The comments are not vague and veiled, they speak of the film as though the writer knew, but they leave something of the finish to the imagination. Burt S. Johnson writes:

> Am inclosing first three issues of our weekly program. While I carry a piano ad on the back you will notice this is a program rather than a business directory. It costs $2 for 500. I have a mailing list of farmers. Last week I mailed 50 programs and our Saturday business increased about 30 per cent. This week I am mailing nearly 200. I believe they are more effective when mailed. I use one cent stamps. Our population is 1,200. For town distribution I take them to school at noon and send some out with the grocer's delivery boy.

He adds that he will appreciate criticism, but we do not see that he stands in need of much advice.

Exclusive Service.

Exhibitors using the General Film's exclusive service may find something in this advertisement of the Majestic Theater, Springfield, Ohio:

> EXCLUSIVE SERVICE AND WHAT IT IS.
> The opening of the New Majestic will inaugurate a new plan of the General Film Company, which has long been under consideration, the new Exclusive Service.
> EXCLUSIVE SERVICE means a master program of subjects selected for their especial fitness, and supplied to the Majestic, and the Majestic alone, in this city.
> THE OBJECT is to give absolute protection to Majestic patrons, and insure them of a program that cannot be duplicated or seen in any other theater in this city.
> It is expected that there will be many who will be inclined to doubt as to the practicability of an exclusive service, but the General Film Company has devoted a great deal of time and thought to the matter and is certain that it has evolved an entirely practical plan, that will work smoothly from the start. There are many advantages to a service of this kind, not the least of which is the very EXCLUSIVENESS itself, to say nothing of the peace of mind it will bring to the patron who has the assurance of a superior program.
> The procuring of this service at a heavy cost is but an illustration of the policy of the management, that there is Nothing Too Good For Their Patrons, no matter what the cost.

Advertising space must be cheap in Springfield, for the Majestic takes fourteen inches across two columns, and a sister house, the Princess, takes more, while the other houses all come in for a lot of space. It all seems to be good advertising, but we like better the more specific advertising of the Princess, which tells just what is offered each night than the broadly general statement of the new service.

In Memoriam.

We reprint from the Olympian Theater News, Seattle, this tribute to an employee who has gone. From the paragraph it appears that she is one of those who died close to the firing line and who did not permit her personal sufferings to interfere with her duty to her employers. There are many who, like Miss Westring, place duty first. There are others. It is as an example to those others that this extract is reprinted. Do you permit your own troubles to rise superior to your duty to your employer, or do you, like Miss Westring, place duty first? There is a lesson here that warrants this use of space, the lesson of one who gave the cheerful service for which she was paid in spite of her personal suffering. We are glad to see the Olympian appreciative. We are glad to add our own small appreciation of this high private in the army of employees. We hope that some day, when the rules are turned for us, that we will merit the same "Well done," than which no higher epitaph can be given.

> The little girl who used to give you smiles, pleasant words and tickets has passed beyond.
> You did not know when she greeted you with her cheery "good evening" that she was suffering pain that would make you or me lie down and groan in agony. For a long time she had been tortured by a complicated disease, but she was not the kind to trouble others with her troubles, to give others pain because she suffered.
> Many of you missed her pleasant smile when she left the ticket booth, and upon inquiring learned that she had finally been forced to give up and go to the hospital. The surgeons operated once, then again and still again. She rallied, then sank into the dark shadows; rallied again, and at last closed her eyes and they drew the shroud.
> But through it all she smiled. She made life brighter.

Surely there can be no better epitaph than the record of service given and of work well done.

Booming the Snakes.

The Alamo Theater, New Orleans, has been featuring the Coils of the Python, and it has been dressing up its front. In the photograph it would seem that some of the red capitals have sunk into the dark background, but this, of course, is merely a question of actinic values. It may be that a hint will be conveyed to others in the sign in front of the lion, which reads that it is loaned by the United Shirt and Collar Company, makers, as we recall, of the Lion Brand shirts or collars, we forget which. At first glance the effect of the lion is not lost in the lettering. Perhaps you can borrow props [illegible] as credit [illegible]. Who the gentleman [illegible] we gather that he has just been looking at the box office receipts. The Alamo seems to be doing a lot of special front stuff. It seems to pay and perhaps there is a hint to others in this preparation. Of course, the Florida moss is at the disposal only of the southern exhibitors, but much of the display can be duplicated in the north, and anything that makes the lobby representative of the leading reel is worth while.

Not In the Running.

We are in receipt of a very courteous letter from the Amusement Guide, Aberdeen, S. D., in which they comment on a recent paragraph in this department lamenting the use of "boiler plate" in the former Idle Hour Educator. From this letter is appears that the paper started by C. T. Smithers, of the Idle Hour theaters, is no longer to be regarded as a motion picture publication, the control having passed to a general management which is running it as a general sheet and not as a purely photoplay publication.

It is evident from the present appearance of the Guide that it has done what Mr. Smithers failed to do. It has placed the paper on a paying basis and, as they suggest, they are giving the readers what they seem to want rather than the photoplay matter that we think they should have. The Guide has the best of the argument. As a general publication it passes from our jurisdiction and we wish them all good luck. At least one house organ has been graduated into the general class. And yet, at the same time, not many minutes since, we lunched with the "big man," of a paper with more than a million circulation, who wanted to get more circulation through the use of more photoplay material. What seems to be the answer? At any rate, the Amusement Guide is giving advertising value and getting paid advertisements, and that is what it is there for.

Programs Wanted.

Bert Williams says there are 452 weekly programs published regularly, counting Jack Nash's Isis News, which is not being published at present, which is more or less of a bull. Will some of the publishers please send samples to Mr. H. R. Goldman, the Cozy Theater, Marinette, Mich. They want to get in line, and from the attractive appearance of their letterhead we think they will get out a good one.

And we would like to explain to others who may write in that we cannot send samples of old programs. As soon as the matter is treated it goes into the basket since our office is not a large one and we need some space for ourselves.

Some Savoy Ads.

We like to get advertisements from the Savoy Theater, Wilmington, Del. Either they have an unusually good lot of compositors in that town or someone around the house knows how to mark copy. It would seem to be the latter, for the copy is as good as the display and the display will take a lot of beating and still win out. Nicholas A. Jones writes:

> We believe that by advertising, we not only produce results in increased attendance at our theater, but also we keep or retain the confidence of the public who are already our patrons.

This is what we have always contended, that the proper use of the advertising columns not only brings new trade but holds that already obtained. One reason for the success of the Savoy advertising is that they give more attention to the house, which is there year in and year out, than to the films that are there for but a day or two. By all means tell the people what you will have and when you will have it, but say something, too, about the house.

One advertisement that was used around last Christmas time, suggests that the Christmas shopper will find rest and entertainment by breaking the shopping trip with an hour at the Savoy, an excellent suggestion as well from the viewpoint of the shopper as from the theater's side. This idea is worth making much of for the next few weeks. It might pay to send out a special card. Perhaps some enterprising store will let you use their own mailing list if you use some such combination as

at Blank's Big Store
Then rest for an hour at the
DREAMLAND
Before you go home
You'll be surprised how much it will help

Stuff along this line will not hurt you any and it will, in a large measure, draw to your house the shopping patron who may not ordinarily see your performance.

If you are at the other end of the line—in the residential district, circularize your own list and suggest that an hour in the theater will send the visitor home with shopping cares forgotten.

House Argument.

The Savoy does not run much to black type and as a result the big points stand out like the business end of a tack in a dark bedroom when you're in your bare feet. They run three double reels a week and the title of each and the name of the house stand out prominently in the advertisement sent. In the line of house argument we reproduce the wording of two of their advertisements, regretting that we cannot reproduce the typographical points as well.

> There's a whole lot more to the moving picture business than a person can really imagine. Good pictures can be easily spoiled by poor projection. One of the principal features of the Savoy Theater pictures is that they are always clean, pure and bright—never hurting a person's eyes.
> The program is always very carefully selected—insuring our patrons of the best that money and careful inspection can insure. There's some class to our illustrated songs, too.

> Have you ever heard expressed a phrase like this—"that picture was almost as clear as the Savoy's." Of course, you have heard it! And there is a reason for people talking so good about the projection of the pictures at the Savoy.
> Here's the reason: First, all subjects to be shown at the Savoy are first carefully selected; second, they must be of the kind that will please our patrons; third, then they are correctly projected by experienced operators on the highest grade make of machines; and fourth, we see to it that the musical program blends correctly with the "action" of the photoplays.
> We think the reason for our great patronage lies in the fact that you want to be "picture pleased"—and that we are doing all in our power to supply your taste with really good pictures.
> The admission at the Savoy is always 5c—irrespective of the fact that we show many special features.

These are both reproduced from class publications where this form of appeal is particularly effective.

Why Not?

Mr. J. M. Blanchard, of the Peoples Theater, Sunbury, Pa., seems some het up over the fact that the Kleine "Quo Vadis?" pictures are to be shown in other than picture theaters and that the advertising states that these reels have never been shown in picture theaters. He seems to think that the exhibitor should resent the Kleine enterprise since they also receive Kleine subjects.

At a quick glance Mr. Blanchard has somewhat the best of the argument, but has he really? Mr. Blanchard has a nice house in a prosperous Pennsylvania town, and he was perfectly willing to pay whatever the Kleine representatives demanded for the "Quo Vadis?" reels. He thinks that since he has played other Kleine specials, some of which are not better than ordinary, he should have had the "Quo Vadis?" as an offset.

But on the other hand consider the effect of showing the "Quo Vadis?" in the regular theater. As Mr. Blanchard observes, the regular houses have done their best to kill off the picture theaters. Now they are to have "Quo Vadis?" and the picture theater does not get it. Still, the fact that the pictures are coming into the regular theater should count for something. Many persons would not go to see "Quo Vadis?" or anything else in a picture theater. They will go to a combination theater to see pictures or anything else. How about these people afterward? They have suddenly found that the photoplay of today is by no means the flashy trash that was shown some years ago and which, ever since, has been their idea of photoplays. The "Quo Vadis?" film is doing Mr. Blanchard and all other managers more good in the regular theater than it ever could in his house. He doesn't get any part of that "50-50," but if he will look beyond the immediate division of the profits, he will see that this supposed hostile invasion is no more than a missionary meeting. He will profit more than the regular theater will in the long run.

Not Sitting Down.

And just to show that he is not sitting with folded hands, Mr. Blanchard put in Homer's "Odyssey" and brought a lecturer down from New York. Perhaps he got a chance to go to the bank the next morning, anyhow. Here is a clipping from one of the "Odyssey" advertisements that may be of use to others:

> Last night we said that the pictures were good, and the people left their happy homes to come and see them. We did not disappoint a single person.
> To-night we say the same thing, they are good, but no comedies.

Ground Rules.

CERTAINLY we know that the baseball season is over, but the simile is apt. For the benefit of three or four persons who do not know baseball and also for the benefit of William H. Kitchell, who knows only the synthetic product supplied to Newark, we will elucidate. Baseball is governed by certain general rules applicable to the game and to certain other rules applicable to certain ball yards and to these only, governing purely local conditions. Any team playing that yard abides by the ground rules. With this lengthy preamble, let's get down to business by reading this letter:

> I shall write no more for the screen, and for two reasons. There is no money in the game for the writer, and with my pessimistic views I don't believe I could bring out the best that is in me. I know that the fact that I am dropping out will make no difference to the producers. Other and better writers will enter and take the small niche I tried to fill.
> Here is the way it looks to me:
> You have certain wares you wish to dispose of. I come along to inspect them, with the expressed intention of purchasing if interested. You permit me to take as many of the articles as I wish with me to examine at my leisure, and tell me that if I care to buy any of them I may do so at my own price and make payment whenever I see fit. Meantime if I should lose any of the articles while in my hands, you will bear the loss. Is there any other such business in the world?
> Of course, producers may say that they do not have to change their autocratic rules. They do not. The reason why they can make and enforce whatever rules they see fit is because the contributors rush over each other in their eagerness to have their work accepted, regardless of the terms. If writers would only use a little common sense this writing business would soon be on a different and more satisfactory basis. Let all writers copyright their scripts (How can they? Ed.), mark plainly the lowest price they will take for it, and place on it a time limit for examination. You know as well as I do that there is no sense in a company keeping a script ten weeks for examination and then returning it with a slip.
> That bugaboo about the producers declining to consider work from outside sources should not frighten any writer. Let them. I, for one, wish they would. It is certain they must receive their scripts from some source, and if the Great Army is excluded, the experienced writers, to whom they must turn, will see that they receive payment commensurate with their services.
> Scenario editors are merely human. They are made of the same clay as the rest of us; they are by no means what some worshipful members of the Great Army believe them to be. But some of these same editors are the most egotistical specimens that ever contaminated this orb of ours. They have been spoiled by fawning sycophants, who try by flattery to sell something that has no chance offered on its merits.
> To sum up in a nutshell: Film companies are under no obligation to pay any fixed price for scripts, to examine and report within any fixed period—or to receive contributions at all. On the other hand, no one is obliged to write and submit anything. If producers want scripts let them pay a fair price for acceptances, and pay it as promptly as they have to pay their other bills. If they decline to do this, let the writers turn their talents in some more lucrative direction. That is what I am doing.

This writer is suing a Mutual Company for the price of a script they took and has two others accepted and not yet paid for. He figures that he has averaged $1.83 a day for the time spent. Naturally, he does not regard this as a living wage.

Perhaps you will say that this is the wail of a man who knows no better. Well, let's turn to someone who should. The current issue of The Writer's Magazine puts the same wail in this form:

> No manufacturer submits the goods upon approval but the writer. No other producer would think of letting his wares, through the sale of which he earns a living, remain in the hands of a prospective, or possible, purchaser for months without any report made upon them, or bow in meek submission—the season of sale having passed while they were retained—when his wares are returned to him with the curt comment that it has been decided that they were "not available at the present time."
> And yet the poor writer must not protest, he must meekly tuck away his damaged goods, or re-write the soiled manuscript, and wait for another season to roll around, or revamp his stories and try for another market!

Another "boob" contributor? Not a bit of it. This is the lead of an editorial in which the writer goes on to say that the magazine considers the "posting" of certain editors. The first correspondent can be excused, but no magazine supposed to represent the best good of the writer can possibly be excused for this sort of a stand. On the whole we have more respect for our correspondent than for the editorial writer. He, at least, recognizes the existence of the ground rules.

The statement that no manufacturer submits his goods on approval but the author is manifestly a foolish and unconsidered statement; the ignoring of a truth for the sake of a broadly general statement, but let us suppose that the untruth is the truth, that the statement is based on fact and not merely made for the sake of making a false point. For the moment, then, the author, alone of all the craftsmen, must submit his work on approval. What then?

If you need shoes you go to a shoemaker or a shoe store. If you require clothing you go to a tailor or a clothing store. If you need food you go to the butcher, the baker or grocery. If you want a house you go to the real estate man. You do not ask him to send you a shovel full of earth and a couple of bricks as a sample of the house and lot he has for sale. You go look at the house. Very well.

You go to the clothing store to see what they have.

You go to the shoe store to see what they have.

You go to the grocer to see what he has.

You go to the real estate man to see what he has.

The inference is plain. If you do not like the way the business of authorship is being conducted sit down and wait until the editor comes to you. Isn't it funny that no one ever thought of that solution before? Of course, you must advertise, just as the butcher, the grocer or the shoeman advertises. Perhaps your grocer does not advertise. You may search every paper for his name and never find it. But the front of his shop is an advertisement. You can do the same. Get a nice little black and gilt sign that reads:

John Jones
Authoring for Sale

Put it in the front window or over the door like the doctor or the grocer, then sit down and wait for trade to come to you.

Perhaps you've gone to the front door some times to get a small sample of soap or breakfast food or something like that. Some man, more enterprising than his fellows, is trying to work up a trade by giving away samples. That's a good idea. If your idea shop is not very liberally patronized, why not send out a few samples? Send out a couple of dozen half-reel stories free with the suggestion that you will be glad to show a full line of two-reel subjects at your place of business. Maybe that will induce a few editors to come to your shop, and again maybe it won't, but if you want to work like a grocery store, follow the grocery store methods. Lots of grocers fail and quit the business. Lots of others succeed.

Even a physician has to have an office and office hours. The author merely requires a few stamps and some envelopes to embark in business. He is under no great expense, he is not tied down in any way until he gets orders and yet he kicks, and others kick for him, because he has to show the prospective purchaser what he has to sell. He doesn't have to fit up an office and advertise. He writes a story, sends it out and waits. Nine hundred and ninety-nine times out of a hundred he gets a reasonably prompt reply, and if he has the goods to sell he gets checks in fair proportion, but because he cannot slip a story into the Munsey office and come out with a check in his pocket, he feels himself aggrieved. He feels aggrieved because he must pay the return postage to get his property back. He feels aggrieved because he must wait for his money. Surely his case is most pitiful.

Pitiful! Piffle!

We have marketed between 1,500 and 2,000 short stories and never lost a script, because we didn't send stuff to every Tom, Dick and Harry. We did business in a business-like way with recognized buyers of material, with the McClure Syndicate, with the Munsey Company, with the Green Book, the New Age and others who used about the grade of stuff we wrote and who had business standing. We did not rake over the news stands for all sorts of new magazines of which we knew nothing. We did not send stuff to Harpers and the Century when we were not writing their sort of stuff, and so we made a maximum of sales with a minimum of expense and we didn't care whether we sold the same week we sent in or had to wait three or four months. We went at the serious business of selling in a serious sort of way, just as everyone else can do, and we never had a kick coming save once when a man who had the money didn't give it to us because he was too lazy to write the check.

It's the same way in photoplay. You'll not lose scripts if you send to real companies and then kick if your stuff gets mutilated; not a vicious nasty kick, but a polite protest at the defacement of your material. It would be better if you did not kick at all. We have had to wait three and four months for replies to our scripts in the general market and where we do much business with a company we let them lie indefinitely. The top date with one company is February 28 of this year and with another May 14. we have had checks since then for other and much later stories, but we'll let a script lie nine months if the purchaser thinks that at some time he can use it. Of course, it might sell more quickly to another concern, but it's just as easy to write another story for that other concern. We have 28 scripts with one concern, half that number with another and from five to ten with others, and yet we do not complain that the author is the only producer who has to submit on approval. It's the way that stuff is sold and since those are the ground rules we abide by them.

If you don't want to play ground rules play in your own yard, but you'll be almighty lonesome. If you do play ground rules play without kicking. You'll be twice as prosperous and just as happy.

Undoubtedly there are many irritating occurrences in selling stuff, but kicking isn't going to help any. If a company keeps your stuff three months and then doesn't buy try them again. If they do it a second time cut them off your list. You are not compelled to submit to that company, but if you do submit, play the game according to their rules so long as you are on their home grounds. If you do not like the rules, do not try to play. If you do not want to submit on approval, simply stay home and wait until the editor comes to you—if he ever does, but stop crying in the meantime.

The Inquest Club.

Although it fell on a holiday, the second meeting of the Inquest Club for this season was almost as well attended as the first, and about thirty persons gathered in the Morgue at Keene's Chop House following the session at the Savoy Theater. C. B. Hoadley was the leading witness at the inquest and he gave a lot of eye-opening information to the newcomers. He stated that the eastern Universal office was practically not in the market at present. He also touched on many matters of more general interest. An effort will be made this season to have one star witness at each meeting.

The date of the next meeting will be October 27th. If you have not attended a meeting come to the Savoy about half past seven, if you would see the entire bill. About half past nine we will adjourn to the Morgue. The mere fact of your attendance will constitute you a member so long as you retain your interest. Through the courtesy of the management of the Savoy—and it is a most courteous and obliging management—a slide will be flashed at the proper time. If it is not the illuminated clock on the stage will show you when it is about time to get out.

On the Level.

Since its inception, this department has objected to the various schools of instruction by correspondence in the art of writing photoplays. It has been—and still is, for that matter—our opinion that only portions of the art may be taught, but the chief objection has been that the schools have been conducted on get-rich-quick principles, and they have done untold hurt to the business, not alone through encouraging the manifestly unfit in the belief that they could write, but in creating the general belief that photoplay writing was something that could be "picked up" in a few days or even in three hours, according to one school.

Lately we have had the opportunity to get a very clear idea as to the methods of one school, and it was shown that the scheme was an out and out swindle; a legal as well as a moral swindle. Scripts were revised (at five dollars each) that were manifestly unfit to be offered for sale, and the alleged selling bureau made a single submission to the studio and the revision went back on the author's hands for subsequent submission.

But it is evident that there is a demand for course instruction, and we welcome the advent into the field of Arthur Leeds, who has taken up the photoplay writing section of the Home Correspondence Schools. We have already commented upon Mr. Leeds' and Dr. Esenwein's book, which is to be used as the basis for the course. We are now in possession of the lesson syllabus, laying out the book into lessons. The greater value of the course, we think, will come from Mr. Leeds' personal instruction, and, so far as we know, Mr. Leeds is the first fully qualified writer to engage in course instruction by mail. He is not only able to write scripts that sell, but he is able to communicate his knowledge to others, which is a more important consideration. Still more than that, Mr. Leeds is earnest and honest and we have his assurance that the incompetent will not be encouraged to believe that they will win fortunes, and that the manifestly unfit will not be enrolled as pupils. That he appreciates his position we think he shows in this extract from one of his letters in which he says: "A man might work at a carpenter's bench for twenty years, and then suddenly be stung by the photoplay writing bee. He takes a 'fake' course, fails, and goes back to the bench. He's a sadder and a wiser man, but will he ever again be a contented man? Can he ever again do his own work; the work he is adapted for, as he used to do it? Isn't the rat of discontent always gnawing at his heart; isn't he, in truth, a broken man?"

And that is just the point. The clerk, the mechanic, the housewife, encouraged by glowing advertisements, cozened by specious lies, is never again content to take up the old grind. Ever there is the belief that what the school said was true, that they can write and that only the failure or inability of the editors to recognize greatness is keeping them back from the sphere of mental, instead of physical, labor, and ever the rat gnaws at the aching heart.

Since there is a demand for a school course we are glad that there has at last come into being a school that we believe will be conducted fairly and honestly and we welcome Mr. Leeds to the ranks of those who sincerely seek to teach. We believe that he will make good his promise and his promises.

Winter Stuff.

Winter stuff doesn't mean snow scenes, but about this time of year many companies are going to the South and Southwest to escape the frosts, the bare trees and the static. If you want to provide suitable stuff for these field companies write mostly outdoor scenes and where you must have studio sets keep them simple, since not many of the field companies carry much stuff with them and work on an open stage. It is a simple matter, as a rule, to throw the action outdoors. That dining room scene can become breakfast on the lawn or piazza, the business appointment can be translated into a chance meeting in front of the office building, the proposal in the parlor will look much better in a garden or on the water.

Remember, too, that field companies do not number a host of extras and it is not always easy in small towns to hire people who can act before the camera, so keep your casts small.

For those companies working in New York all winter keep your scenes inside as much as possible and remember that the woodland stuff will show bare branches and dry grass.

At the same time do not spoil a good story by making it fit. Let it lie until next year. If it's a good script it is worth waiting with.

Fall Styles In Comedy.

We are sorry to have to say it, but if you want to write a generally salable comedy you must write the "rough stuff." One or two companies still adhere to the sort of comedy that lingers in your brain after you have left the theater, but most of the companies are now demanding the knock down and drag out style of stuff. If your leading character is coming down the street, he no longer should walk; he should take it on the run and bowl over a policeman or an apple woman as he nears the camera. If you are in communication with any comedy producing company and the editor has tried to tell you what is wanted, it's dollars to doughnuts that you've been told "like Keystone."

So long as managers judge by laughter and applause and not by mental impression (and we suppose that they always will because they always have), the knockabout stuff that gets the laugh and if forgotten the next moment will have the call. If you can write real light comedy you still have about three markets, but if you can put a bounce (cousin to the punch) in every scene, you'll have about ten markets. It's easy stuff to write if you can write in good business, but remember that there must still be some form of plot as well as the rapid action. The more unostentatious plot you can get in, the better your chance of a sale.

Thinks He Must Be Pulled.

Here is an extract from a letter that came in this week:

> I firmly beleive it necessary to get pulled:—to get write in with the Editor. Can you arrange it for me? However I beleive that all Editors are simps:—especialy Keystone and Broncho:—they rite on back of rejection slip "utterly inconcistant and lacking in situation." Keystone gets my goat, they call Fatty's day off "an ides and reject a real idea. Broncho says likes civil war pictures. When person sends civil war picture they forget what they said. Such is life in this rotten world. Others say want pictures of true American life. I send true American life where the hero gets all the hell and the villian all the money and the girl. They also forget what they said.

And yet people wonder why it is that not more than one per cent. of the submissions to a studio are reasonably good. The writer is sadly informed that we cannot help him to get pulled. If he is wise he'll go to school before he seeks to become an author: unless he is trying to "kid" us.

Inquiries.

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of addresses to which photoplays may be sent will be mailed on receipt of a STAMPED AND ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of a script.

A. M.—We regret we cannot supply the desired address.

DULZ.—"Just how scenarios should be written" is fully set forth in the sample scripts recently printed in this department. Get these copies.

RUBEENA.—Pleasantly disappointed in the picture. Thanks. Pathe casts are not available. The last answer was not "kinda cold." Far be it from such.

MRS. J. R.—There is not the least possible chance of Miss Lawrence and Mr. Johnson working together again in pictures. Each is strong enough to be a star. Mr. Johnson is entirely content with Lubin. Miss Lawrence probably is contented with Victor. Nothing you can do or say will bring these popular players together, so please do not ask a generally patient Answers Man to perform the impossible. Miss Lawrence may be addressed in care of the Universal. She is too busy to reply to the many letters she receives.

MISS T.—We do not know precisely why Miss Lawrence did not return to the Lubin Company. Possibly she was not asked. Just because you think that Miss Lawrence and Mr. Johnson should play together is no reason for calling Miss Briscoe "bandy legged." We saw her at the exposition, too, but did not notice a split skirt. How do you know she is? We are glad you like Miss Lawrence, but please keep it in a couple of pages after this. The Answers Man works by the job, not by the day, and nothing you can say will help raise her salary or bring her and Arthur Johnson into the same company, and so ———.

A. L. J.—Anna was Miss Ruth Roland. We do not find any other woman character cast. Name the American character "The Hero" is too vague.

L. T.—If your exchange does not handle the Comet releases, phone the Universal main office and the release will be found for you.

K. B. K.—Cyril Gottlein had the title role in "The Orphan of War" Minnie Prevost, a full blooded Sioux Indian, was the Mammy in "Old Mammy's Secret Code." Jack Hamilton is the K-B Shorty. Nick Cogley was the father and Roscoe Arbuckle the boy in "Mamma's Boy."

K. McC.—No company is in the market for college plays. Keep away from the people you mention.

PITTSBURGH.—There is no way in which an outsider can break into a motion picture company with several thousand experienced players clamoring for a chance.

E. H. B.—You will find the entire cast of "Tess" in the issue for October 4, page 36. The fog is probably an underexposed picture. We did not see the reels and cannot say.

E. L. W.—The players you mention are regularly appearing in the Biograph, but the enlargement of the company shows them less frequently than of old, and you do not get the ones in which they appear. The Biograph Identifier has not yet obtained the name of the father in "The Law and His Son." James Cooley, formerly a Reliance player, is the newcomer you seek to identify.

Question No. 4.

BEST answer will be published and names of others sending in replies of excellence will be published in the "Roll of Honor."

How would you know when the brushes in your motor or generator required renewal and how would you go about installing the new ones? Also what care and attention would you give them and the commutator?

Some Very Interesting Data.

Mr. Martin continues:

> The lens system of projectors: Many different combinations of lenses have been experimentally developed, but no radical changes have been made in the earliest form used in the magic lantern.

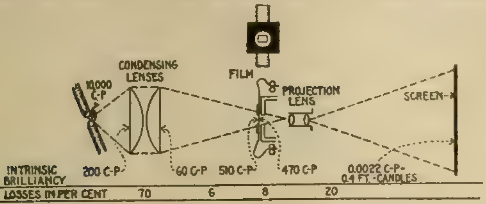

Fig. 6.—The lens system of projectors

> The lens system and the losses therein are illustrated in Figure 6. It has been built up with a point source of light as a basis, consequently the low efficiency of 10 per cent. is not surprising and there is apparently a great opportunity for improvement.

In the first place the statement that there is an efficiency of only 10 per cent. is, to my way of thinking, not a fair statement. As I understand the diagram presented, Mr. Martin assumes an efficiency of 10,000 c.p. at the arc. That is to say, the surface of the crater itself has a light intensity of 10,000 c.p., but after the rays have spread there is only an efficiency of 200 c.p. at the front face of the condenser. And now comes something I do not quite understand. Apparently Mr. Martin's diagram shows a loss of 140 c.p. in the condenser itself, or in other words, the light which has a 200 c.p. efficiency at the front surface of the condenser only has 60 c.p. after having passed through the condenser, or, to put it still another way, there is a loss of 70% in the condenser itself. The light is then re-condensed until it shows an efficiency of 500 c.p. at the aperture. Mr. Martin shows a loss of 6%, however, between the condenser and the aperture. Just how he figures it I am unable to understand, nor do I see how there could possibly be a loss of 6% while the light was traveling between the condenser and the aperture. It is, however, possible that this loss is intended to represent the loss of light in the spot itself, which must of necessity be considerably larger than the aperture. At the front of the film Mr. Martin shows an efficiency of 510 c.p. and after passing through the lens an efficiency of 470 c.p. Now here again I am unable to follow his reasoning. If he means that the brilliancy of the light has been dulled 8% by the celluloid itself, all right. I presume that might be approximately correct; but if he means that the celluloid and the shadows of the photographic emulsion together only cause a loss of 8%, then that is a matter open to very large argument. Apparently Mr. Martin places the loss in the objective lens at 20%, though it is not quite clear whether this is what is meant or not.

I do not understand this diagram quite well enough to argue with neighbor Martin, though I can see that the results shown, can, in the very nature of things, be only approximate, since the quality of lenses, particularly the condensing lenses, would cut a big figure, as would the size of the spot at the gate and also the kind of screen used.

We should be very glad indeed to have Mr. Martin give us a full explanation of this chart, supplemented by his views in relation thereto, at his earliest convenience.

We will continue with the publication of an interesting chart showing the performance of projector arcs in direct and alternating current on various types of current rectifiers.

Later.

Concerning the foregoing I wrote Mr. Martin a personal letter and present herewith his reply:

> In answer to your first question relative to the light losses in the lens system—the principal loss is in the low grade glass in the condensing lenses. The losses given in Fig. 6 are for a pair, 6.5 and 7.5 inch, average fifty cent condensers. All tests were made with a Sharp-Millar photometer by placing a standard test plate at the point the intrinsic brilliancy is indicated by figures in Fig. 6. This test plate is a smooth white surface which reflects a definite percentage of light.
> By placing this test plate flush with the surface of the condenser next to the arc and measuring the light reflected therefrom, it was found that 200 candle power was the brilliancy of each square inch of the condenser surface next to the arc, which was previously tested and placed in the axis of the lens in a position that gave a clear, round spot on the aperture plate. When the test plate was moved the outside condenser the indication taken in the same manner was 60 candle power per square inch, or a loss of 70 per cent., which is the difference between 60 and 200 candle power.
> It does not seem reasonable to believe that apparently clear glass would have such a loss. There is something over 3 per cent. loss in the thin bulb of an electric lamp and as much as 80 per cent. in the same bulb when colored red, yet we cannot detect any loss because we cannot perceive the amount of light inside the bulb. We see only that which gets through. Holding a condenser over a white piece of paper in the sunlight shows the loss when we contrast its shadow with the unobstructed rays of sunlight.
> At the aperture plate the brilliancy rises on account of the rays being condensed. We condense the diameter of the beam of light about three times which gives us nine times the brilliancy which was measured by placing the photometer test plate at the aperture plate. After this measurement a clear piece of film was taken and tested to determine the amount of light passing through it. The loss was from 5 to 12 per cent., averaging 8 per cent. The screen illumination was then measured by the same method and was found to average as shown in Fig. 6 on a screen (picture space), ten by twelve feet. About 15 per cent. of the light is lost in the projection lens which is generally of high grade glass and is comparatively thin.
> In answer to your second question about the comparative efficiencies of transformers, motor-generators and mercury arc rectifiers, shown in Fig. 7, I will say that a standard lamp house was set and the spot was focused on the test plate of the photometer. Current was then supplied through the different devices successively, the input (energy going into the machine), being measured by a standard wattmeter and checked against the indication of the photometer. The results secured checked closely with figures given out by Prof. Gage, of Cornell University, and I believe would be identical if he had placed his lamp in a lamp house and tested it under operating conditions.
> The reason the mercury arc rectifier is more efficient than 110 volts, direct current, through a resistance, is that the rectifier is a combination of the transformer and the rectifying tube. The current from the 110 volt, alternating current line passes through this transformer or economizer, which reduces it with very little loss before it passes through the tube. The tube has a loss of 14 per cent. approximately. It is entirely practical to connect a tube to an ordinary economizer and thereby double the light without increasing the current.
> In conclusion I wish to mention a new lamp which was demonstrated at the recent National Convention of the Illuminating Engineering Society at Pittsburgh, Pa. These lamps were of the incandescent type giving 5,000 candle power, consuming 2.5 kilowatts and have a life of 2,000 hours. The filament is drawn tungsten and, instead of a vacuum in the bulb, it is filled with nitrogen gas at atmospheric pressure. This lamp is being developed for headlights, lighthouses and projectors of all types. The filament is short, heavy and helical, approaching the requirements of projection. The lamp will be on the market within a short time and gives promise of being adapted to projection in a manner that will eliminate the wasteful condensers, at the same time giving a steady, quiet light requiring very little attention.

I do not know of any one thing that has been published in the department of greater value than this. So far as I know this is the first really intelligent effort made to discover the true efficiency of the lens system. So far as the actual difference between 10,000 candlepower at the arc and the candle power at the surface of the condenser, I think, that in order to determine this matter in any adequate way there would have to be some means of measuring the actual total candle power given out at the crater surface of the arc itself, and then a comparison would have to be made between the area of the surface of the crater and the area of the condensers; the real available candle power would then be the candle power of a section of the surface of the condenser equal in area to the area of the crater multiplied by the number of times that area would be contained in the total area of the condenser. This, I think, if it can be done, would give the actual loss of light inside the lamp-house, that is to say, in effect it would tell us the total amount of light given off at the crater, and the proportion falling outside of the area of the condenser.

The conclusion of Brother Martin as to the loss of light, in the condenser itself, seems to me to point to a very important, and I might almost say an enormously important conclusion, viz.: that high grade glass in a condenser is of very great importance. It also points to the necessity of manufacturers evolving some scheme for stopping condenser breakage, so that really high class lenses may be used for condensing. It also apparently points to the fact that there would be a far greater loss of light in the short focal length condenser than in its longer focal length brother. I have the report of Prof. Gage, of Cornell University, and his conclusions, as friend Martin says, are very nearly the same as his own.

As to the new lamp, I shall be very glad indeed to examine one of these as soon as they are ready, and unquestionably if they make for projection without the use of the condenser then they will be a great step in advance. By the way, the correctness of Mr. Martin's conclusions as concerning the condenser was partly proven by a reflector which was demonstrated to the editor something more than a year ago. It utilizes all the light without the aid of the condenser, and projects an excellent moving picture, white and brilliant, with about 12 amperes of current. This reflector, of course, utilizes all the light, which the condenser does not, and never can do. The prime objection to the reflector was that it necessarily left the front of the lamp-house open, and that the authorities would not stand for when an unenclosed arc lamp was used.

Friend Martin is entitled to the sincere thanks of every reader of this department as well as its editor for his clear and most excellent letter. We trust, as we advance with his series of articles, we shall have more of them.

Many Thanks.

Mr. George L. Wilson, of Atlanta, Ga., who represents the General Film Company, writes:

> I have been on the road for the Commercial Branch of the General Film Company, out of Atlanta, for the past few months, making the small towns mostly. I have, during my trips, done all I could to place the World and the Handbook in theaters which did not already have them. I did this for the general uplift of the business, and I think you will get orders from a great many of the small towns in our territory.

For all of which we trust brother Wilson will accept our sincere thanks. There is, I think, but little doubt that the increased circulation of the World and the Handbook will do much to help the business in that territory, therefore friend Wilson deserves the thanks not only of the Moving Picture World, but also of the exhibitors, operators and audiences who will thus be benefited.

List of Releases Wanted.

Mr. F. F. Earle, Canton, Oklahoma, writes:

> I am operating an Edison machine on 110 volt d.c. We have our own dynamo, which is used for the production of light for our theater only. I had lots of trouble at first, but dug my way out of it all right. We have about 800 population in Canton, and have made the outfit pay for itself this summer. Where can I get a list of released films for the first six months of 1913?

It is certainly to your credit that you have made your outfit pay for itself, in just a few months, in a town of only 800 population. As to the list of released films, I have referred this matter to our business manager, who will communicate with you direct.

In Error.

Canada writes:

> The manager of one of our houses asserts that the only shutter to use on a.c. is the two blade, by reason of the fact that it does not give so much flicker as the three blade. He says the latter, when working on alternating current, gives abnormal flicker. Now, I do not happen to be working for this particular manager, but am using 110 volt current through a Fort Wayne compensarc. I had a two-blade shutter on my machine, but it gave too much flicker, and I substituted a three-blade, which has materially reduced the flicker. My light is not so brilliant as with the two-blade, but the general result is better.

Canada requests that I reply by mail and do not publish, but I think this matter should be explained again, and, therefore, without giving his address, am replying through the department.

The manager is wrong. The two-blade shutter gives more flicker than the three-blade, regardless of the kind of current. However, where 60 cycle a.c. is used, the machine only has to be run a trifle over normal speed to cause the blades of the shutter to get into synchronism with the alternations, thus causing a flashing of the light. It is not a "flicker," but a waving effect; the light goes down and then brightens again. To grasp the idea one must understand the action of alternating current, which is fully explained and illustrated on page 9 of the Handbook in Figure 2. At the instant the lines cross at points 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 (Fig. 2) the current, both voltage and amperage, is at zero, and the light value is enormously reduced. If the shutter blade cuts the light at the instant the current value is at its highest, and opens the lens during the time it is at its lowest, then the result will be an enormously reduced screen illumination. However, in order to keep in synchronism with the alternations the machine would have to be run at an absolutely steady speed, and that speed would have to be precisely such as would maintain the synchronism of the blades and alternations. This, of course, is impractical, and the result is that the shutter will get into synchronism for maybe one or two seconds and then get out of synchronism, and the light will thus flash up and down.

This effect does not occur until the machine crank's speed reaches about 70, if the cycle is 60; but "60 cycle" current is often a little less than that, or a little more, so that there is no certainty as to the exact speed that will cause the trouble. Possibly the current you are using is a little more than 60, and if so you would have to speed your machine up very fast before synchronism would occur. You are perfectly right in using the three-wing shutter if you do not get the synchronizing effect.

The Guilty Wretch.

Mr. Le Roy A. Drake, Rochester, New York, says he is the party who is stamping his name on posters, etc., concerning which Cleveland, O., recently made certain comments.

Now I am not an expert in Yiddish, so am not going to stand sponsor for the spelling of the Hebrew end of friend Drake's remark. However, for the benefit of the uninitiated I will say that Brother Drake merely inquires if "he should worry." To relieve his mind, and calm his fretted nerves I would reply by saying, nix.

Operating Room Construction.

On page 316 of July 19 issue, I started a series of articles dealing with operating room construction, but so great has been the press of matter, the thing was set aside for a time. The article dealt with brick construction. We will now consider.

Concrete Construction.

In a new theater, or in an old theater where a proper foundation can be had there is nothing superior to a concrete constructed operating room. Unless the room be of unusual size it is not necessary to reinforce the walls, though this, of course, may be done if desired.

The concrete should be of reasonably fine stone, and the mixture should be what is known as "rich." Care should be taken that the sand is good, clean, and sharp; also not too fine, a coarse sea sand being best for the purpose, when it can be had. The floor of the room should consist of a layer of cement, not less than four, and preferably six inches in thickness, well tamped down and finished with a top dressing not less than one inch in thickness of sand and cement mixed in the proportions usually used for sidewalk work.

The walls should be not less than five, and preferably six inches thick, though if the room be a small one four inches will answer. Before the room is started the wire conduits should be placed in such manner that they will be embedded in the concrete, the machine outlets coming up out of the floor back of each machine lamp-house. In this way there will be no conduits showing inside the room, and the walls will be perfectly smooth and clear of all obstructions. Suitable iron brackets, designed to carry any desired shelving, etc., should be carefully located and their spurs, or the bolts holding them placed so that they will be embedded in the concrete. All this involves some trouble, but it more than repays in the excellence of the room after it is complete. Near the ceiling of the room a concrete shelf should be provided, ample in size to carry rheostats if that form of voltage reduction is to be used. If a motor-generator set forms part of the equipment, then a proper foundation should be arranged for, and the anchor bolts embedded therein in their proper position. To place the anchor bolts, a wooden templet, or frame should be made of lumber. Lay this frame on the foundation of the motor generator and, with a pencil, trace the anchor bolt holes on the surface of the wooden templet and then, with a suitable brace and bit, bore them out. If the motor generator set has not yet arrived, have its manufacturer provide you a blue print from which you can locate the foundation anchor bolt holes. Having prepared your templet, block it up in the exact position you wish the bottom of the iron base of the motor generator to occupy and hang your foundation bolts in the holes you have provided, being careful that they extend up through the templet far enough to penetrate through the thickness of the motor generator base and allow the nut to get a good grip. You can now build up your foundation at the same time the floor is put in, and the anchor bolts will be solidly imbedded in the concrete. The same scheme can, and should be adopted for anchoring the machines, but this will be found quite difficult unless the machine is there, and can be blocked up into position. The openings in the walls must be carefully located and boxed in, of course. The ceiling of the room should be slightly arched, though a rise of six inches in the arch covering a room eight feet wide will be ample, especially if a couple of half-inch tie rods be used. In the center of the ceiling there should, of course, be a vent hole, and this hole should have an area of not less than 288 square inches. If the ceiling of the operating room comes near the ceiling of the auditorium then the vent flue can be of concrete and be carried up through the roof to the open air. If this is done the vent flue will require no special insulation, since its outer surface would never get hot enough to set anything on fire.

The principal objection to the concrete room, like that of the brick room is its weight. In many instances the operating room rests on a balcony, and a concrete room would weigh anywhere from two to four or five tons, according to its size and the thickness of its walls. Therefore, unless it be a new building in which a proper foundation could be provided, this weight might prohibit the use of either brick or concrete.

Wherever it is practical, however, I strongly advise the use of brick or concrete for operating room walls and ceiling, and concrete in all cases for the floor. Concrete walls are thoroughly fireproof and, to all intents and purpose, sound-proof. These walls, of course, do absorb and retain considerable heat, which is to some extent objectionable, though not seriously so if ample ventilation be provided, as it always should be.

Jenkins' Home Projector.

A gentleman, who winds up with, "Please suppress name, town and state," but does not prohibit my saying that he resides on the Western hemisphere, writes:

> Could you, through the department, advise me as to the cost and the practicability of the Jenkins' Home Projector, or of any device designated to use standard films in the home, or under conditions similar to home use? I have in mind a public library which would call for about a 9-foot picture at about 25 feet, where a regular projector would be out of the question, both on account of size and first cost. Would also like your advice as to what course you would follow if you were about to change from 110 volts d. c. to 110 volts a. c. supply, projecting a 12-foot picture at 68 feet, with a Power's Six machine equipped with a three-wing, outside shutter. What do you consider the best and cheapest method of changing d. c. to a. c., and how would you go about it to get just as good a picture with a. c. as d. c.?

The Jenkins' Home Projector is a practical machine, but the matter of its cost would have to be taken up with Mr. Jenkins himself. Address Mr. Francis Jenkins, 1808 Park Road, Washington, D. C. Pathe also is, I understand, marketing a home projector, but inasmuch as I have not seen the latter machine, I cannot answer as to its practicability. The Jenkins' projector delivers the goods. If I were going to change from d. c. to a. c. supply I would install some method of rectifying the current. This may be done by a General Electric mercury arc rectifier, which is an excellent and very efficient machine, by a motor-generator set, or by a rotary converter. But as concerns these latter two types of devices I have no reliable figures showing efficiency.

Shows Its Value.

Mr. C. E. Lindall, importer of Guil Pastil, whose advertisement appears in the classified columns, writes the editor at some length, winding up with the following:

> The sudden demand for Guil Pastil shows the value of the Projection Department to the trade. I thoroughly appreciate it and am deeply grateful to you.

I quote this remark of friend Lindall's for a purpose. It has been proven time and again that the endorsement of this department is of real value to any manufacturer, or importer, but the only way in which the endorsement of this department can be had, is to prove to us, by some other means than the use of hot air, that the goods are of real value. It will be noticed that this department has never given its unqualified endorsement to any motor-generator set, or rotary converter. The department has admitted receiving some good reports from users of these devices, but it has not given its unqualified endorsement to any make, for the very simple reason that not one of these manufacturers have, up to date, supplied me with working tests, showing the in-take and out-put in wattage under actual working conditions, therefore, I have no means of knowing what their actual efficiency is. There is a very large question right now concerning which the editor is receiving many letters, viz.: Which has the greater efficiency, the motor-generator set, or the rotary converter? This department will be glad to publish actual tests, made before moving picture operator, or manager, witnesses, covering a period of not less than one hour of actual work in projecting a moving picture in a moving picture theater; with in-take and out-put readings, both voltage and amperes, every ten minutes during the hour. Now, Mr. Manufacturer, it is up to you. If your device can make good the claims you put forth for it, let us have this test, or its results, rather. But a test made anywhere else except in actual moving picture theater projection work will not be accepted. You may ask why I would not accept a test made at the factory, provided it be made before competent witnesses. Simply because, while I do not say that it would be, it could be a test made on a special machine, or a machine tuned up for this particular purpose. What I want is a test from some machine you have sold to a moving picture theater, and I want that test without any changes whatever being made. Just go to the theater, put on your ammeter and voltmeter and show us what the machine you have sold the man is doing. After you have made this test, it would be interesting if you made a second test after having eliminated any faults due to the carelessness or ignorance of the operator. By this I mean adjusting the brushes, cleaning the connections, or anything else that is needed to put the plant in first-class condition. Some of you claim an efficiency of 90%. Well, gentlemen, you will have to show me. I will be satisfied if you can make an actual showing of considerably less than that on a machine which has been under the care of an ordinary operator for thirty days' time. Let it be clearly understood that this is not any attempt to knock any machine, or any make of machines, but it is an attempt to get manufacturers to show us what they have actually got, for the benefit of all.

Some Puzzles.

New York City sends in a bunch of nuts to be cracked by the department editor, or our readers. He says:

> I thought that twelve years in this game ought to make a man fairly competent, but have come to the conclusion that I am still, to a certain extent, in my apprenticeship. Here are some things I have run across lately. The exit lights and projection arcs all went out. Main fuse and all fuses in panel box O. K. Found the wire burned off directly flush with B. X. in flush box. (Now, what in thunder is a "flush" box? Ed.). Pulled out enough to make a splice. After I had finished the lights would not burn; all fuses O. K. Went up to the operating room, and found the projection carbons gave a good size spark, and at the same time the exit lights lit up, but when I separated the carbons they went out again. Now, what is the dope on this?
> Here is another one. Motor was a little slow, so I put on a pulley one-half inch larger in diameter, and a new belt. Machine runs like a top, nearly noiseless with the small pulley, but with the larger one the intermittent pounds like a hammer. Pounding occurs on every turn of the sprocket. Power's Six A in fine condition. This is, I believe, the most puzzling thing I have ever encountered. Am testing out a pair of condensers from the White Specialty Company. The combination is a 6½ and a 7½, the 6½ being concave. Believe me, the house never saw a prettier picture since it opened. The light is no brighter, but it is whiter and more evenly distributed. I guess they are real lenses, and not mere moulded glass. The cost is $4.00 per pair, but to anyone who wants better projection they are worth twice that. They will work on any throw up to 100 feet without ghost; over that I do not know. I bought these lenses myself, as the boss could not see over 75 cents for one condenser lens, but I have had $4.00 worth of good projection in two days. Now, don't think this a boost for the Whites, for it is not; it is just a boost for something on its merits. I am working on a little attachment to go on a machine, and if I can get the exact article I want it will improve the light 100%, the operator will have to stay right on the job. The cost will be but little, and it can be attached to any machine. When I have it a little more perfect you can take a run up and look at it in action. If you approve of it, it goes to the Projection Department readers free.

Hum! Well, I do not know about that wire problem. I do not understand what you mean by the flush box, nor do you say which wires were burnt off, but anyhow I don't just see how you could get those results under the conditions named. It is plain that you got the projection and exit light circuits mixed up, but I will pass it up to the readers, as I have not time to dope out a puzzle of that kind. As to the pounding, why, if your arc belted to the fly-wheel and the boxings are just a little bit, or considerably worn, it is conceivable that the difference in the tension of the new belt and the old one might account for the trouble. Of course, you have presumably increased the speed of your machine and that also might possibly account for it. As to the condensers, it strikes me that it might be a good scheme for the White Specialty Company to supply this department with a set of their lenses for experiment. If the improvement is sufficient to justify the increased expense, there are, undoubtedly, many managers who would not allow that to stand in the way of their installation. I shall be glad to look at your invention when it is completed.

Wants To Get In.

Orange, Mass., writes:

> I am an outsider looking in who wants to be an insider looking out. Suppose I will be slapped for sticking my nose in the door, but I am going to risk it. I wonder what certain members of the Union would say if they themselves were on the outside trying to get in, in order to earn for themselves a living, and the Union was trying to keep them not only out, but also in ignorance. I think they would do well to look at both sides of the question. Here is the way I am trying to get in. I am studying everything I can get hold of, including your Handbooks and the Projection Department. I go around to the various theaters, study the projection and pick up all the knowledge I can secure. This winter I propose to take a short course in an electrical school in Boston. Do you think I will succeed?

I see no reason why you should not, though I do not think your method is the best one. My way of doing it, were I in your place, would be to study the department and the Handbook, and at the same time serve an apprenticeship under some competent operator, but this apprenticeship should last not less than six months, and preferably one year. The only trouble is that there are too many "operators" who could teach you all they know in a week, and not work very hard at that. The reason is, of course, they don't know much—about projection. As to the Union keeping men out of the profession, why there are things to be said on both sides. I would heartily favor the limiting of apprentices if we already had a supply of really competent operators, but it is a pretty tough proposition to limit such things at this time, when as a matter of fact there is not one competent operator (mind you, I am talking of real competency now) for one out of every ten jobs, and if you come right down to brass tacks, there is not really one high-class competent man for one out of every twenty-five jobs. That is a broad statement, but it is fact, nevertheless. But this state of affairs is slowly being changed, and the operator is gradually improving himself.

Getting In "Dutch."

Ever since the first part of last May the Kinematograph Weekly of London has been devoting two or three pages a week to the series of articles on projection written by the editor of this department. Editors of German papers have now written proposing to pay for the privilege of re-publishing these articles in the German Kinematograph Press, and it is expected that the same thing will be done in French, and possibly in Russian and Italian.

Projection by Reflection.

Mr. Walter Johnson, Rantoul, Illinois, asks:

> Will you kindly explain to me the details of the revolving mirrors used in moving picture projection? I have heard of it quite often, but have not been able to find out what it is.

It would take up a lot of space to answer your question intelligently, brother Johnson, and, inasmuch as this revolving mirror stunt has not yet been proven to be practical, I do not feel justified in going into the matter except to say briefly that it is a scheme for projecting pictures by means of a mechanism having no intermittent movement, using continuously running film, the picture being reflected through a lens to the screen, the mirror following the motion of the film to a certain limit where the reflection of the next succeeding picture is taken up by the second revolving mirror, which dissolves the second picture into the first, and so on. The mirrors rock rather than revolve, although I believe in some experiments the mirror has been made to revolve as well as rock. The idea would be all right but for one thing, viz: the enormous difficulty of securing two mirrors which will act in precise synchronism of motion with each other. This has not been accomplished, and, frankly, friend Johnson, I do not believe it ever will be. That, however, is simply my own personal opinion, and may prove to be wrong.

A New Pastil.

Mr. Charles Russell, of British Columbia, Canada, sends in the following night letter telegram:

> Am manufacturing a pastil superior to anything now made; gives more illumination and is stronger. Am sending sample used for twelve night. They will sell for 50 cents each.

All right, brother Russell, but I cannot make any comment until I have done with your pastil the same as I did with the other, viz: send out two or three of them for actual test by moving picture operators using gas. Therefore, never mind about the pastil that has been used for "twelve nights," but send about three new ones and I will forward them to gas users, who will make a competent test thereof and report actual results.

China's Trouble O'er.

Mr. J. H. Hallberg writes:

> In communication with my customer, the Arcade Amusement Company, Tientsien, China, I am advised that since they installed the new shaking magnet coil and the new mercury bulb on the G. E. rectifier, which I sold and shipped them, and which they had trouble with, the rectifier is working satisfactorily. They have asked me to so advise you, and have also requested that I axtend their thanks to you for the attention given the matter in the Projection Department.

And thus endeth the chapter with "All's well that ends well."

Burned Wire.

Chillicothe, Missouri, writes:

> Am sending you two burned off terminals. What is the trouble? It seems to me the wire will not carry 60 amperes, taken through a Fort Wayne compensarc. I am using a Motiograph 1911 model lamp-house, and it appears to me that the heat due to resistance, added to that of the arc, simply melts the wire. Neither one of these terminals have been used more than twenty-eight hours. With the terminals I am sending sample of our lamp leads. Is it No. 6 wire? I have no micrometer calliper or would measure and find out. The Handbook certainly is fine.

As regards the sample wire you send in, I find that it has 250 strands and that each strand measures .010 of an inch in diameter. Looking on Table 3, page 34, of the Handbook, you will find that these strands are No. 30 wire, and have an area of 100 circular mills. Now, if each strand has an area of 100 c. m., and there are 250 of the strands, the total area is 25,000 c. m. Looking on Table 1, page 32 of the Handbook, you will find that a No. 8 wire has an area of 16,384 c. m., while a No. 6 has 26,244, therefore, your wire is a dishonest No. 6, being short the difference between 26,244 and 25,000, or 1,244 c. m., or about 12½ strands of wire. In other words, the manufacturer of this wire is a short weight swindler. He has stolen 12½ strands of copper. He is putting out a wire labeled "No. 6," whereas it is not No. 6, or any other standard wire.

In this connection it might be noted that there is a slight discrepancy in the wire tables of various standard works. For instance, Horstmann & Tousley, in Modern Electrical Construction, give the area of a No. 6 wire as 26,250 c. m. The variations, however, do not exceed 10 c. m. in any of the standard works, therefore, it is negligible. By the H. & T. table your wire is short just 12½ strands.

As to the burned off terminals, it is rather difficult to locate the cause. I believe, to start with, there is abnormal heat inside your lamp-house. Very likely the top ventilation is partly, or entirely clogged with carbon ash. Be sure that your top ventilation is open and free, because you have not any too much anyhow. Before you clamp the cable in the terminal, scrape the inside of the terminal and the wire very thoroughly, until both are bright and perfectly clean. Be sure the contact between the terminal and the lamp binding-post is perfectly clean and tight. Aside from this I can see no reason for the abnormal heating of your wires. Of course, the wires in the lamp-house deteriorate very rapidly, but they should by no means burn off in twenty-eight hours. It is possible that your Fort Wayne compensarc is passing more than 60 amperes. If you find the lamp-house ventilation is open and free, that the contacts are good all around, then I guess you will have to get some No. 5 asbestos covered wire, or else reinforce your present leads inside the lamp-house, which could be done by doubling the lead, joining them just outside or inside of the lamp-house.

A Queer Occurence.

Mr. C. F. Lubiens, Ashland, Wis., contributes the following thorny burr for us to open:

> The operator had burned the craters in the new carbons two hours before the show commenced. Everything was left in perfect condition, but when time to start the show came upon bringing the carbons together there was not the slightest indication of current. The lamp appeared to be dead. All switches, wires, etc., were found to be O. K. Still no light. Carbons were changed, but still nothing doing. The current was working all right elsewhere. Old carbons were re-installed—nothing doing. Leaving the carbons in contact with each other, the operator leaned back and looked at the lamp. What he said would not look well in print. He was still contributing blue to the atmosphere when suddenly the arc began to sputter, and all was fine and dandy. The show proceeded. Fully one-half hour elapsed from time trouble started until it ended, and nothing was changed. Now this thing had the operator, as well as my humble self, going south. Can anyone give a reasonable answer? On my trips through the country I find projection is looked up to, and most operators are studying to beat the band. In conclusion let me say that I hope operators will get together and work with the proper authorities, to the end that laws be secured which will do away with the crank twister.

So far as I, myself, am concerned I should say that you must have had a loose connection somewhere. I know of a similar occurrence, however, where, though everything was in good condition, the operator monkeyed around for fifteen or twenty minutes before he could strike an arc; he could get a spark, but that was all. But suddenly the thing started off again the way you have described, and there was no further trouble. Nothing was ever found wrong. Loose connection my guess, because I do not see anything else to attribute it to.

Power's Five A.

Dallas, So. Dak., writes:

> I have a Power's Five A, with screw bushing adjustment. As I do not find anything about this in second edition of the Handbook, I am obliged to ask help. Whenever I have my framing device shifter at the top, the machine runs fine, but as soon as it is shifted to the bottom it runs hard, and with a roar. Had it overhauled a short time ago and it has been troubling thus ever since.

In the first place, my dear sir, this is the first time I have ever heard of the Power's Five A. In the classic language of the street, there ain't no such animal. I presume you mean the Power's Six A, but, if so, what is meant by the "screw bushing" adjustment? Taking everything into consideration, I think you have a Power's Six A, and that connecting link 682, plate 7, page 284 of the Handbook, is loose in its ways. If this is the case, you will be able to tighten it by following instruction 24, on page 275 of the Handbook. The connecting link carries the toggle gear on its upper end, and when it becomes loose in its ways it causes the teeth of the toggle gear, the flywheel pinion and gears 680, plate 3, page 276 to get out of alignment with each other and grind. I think this is all I can do for you at present. If you have a Power's Five machine you will have to come again.

From Omaha.

Omaha, Neb., writes as follows:

> I notice on page 1390, September 27 issue, an article concerning conditions in Omaha. The article in question certainly gives about the straight of it, so far as operators and managers are concerned. Most theaters here are hardly making their salt. Why? The answer is simple. It is because they fail in putting the proper projection on the screen, and they will never have anything better until they pay enough money to get real operators. The writer is himself only receiving $8.00 a week, and in order to get even that much is compelled to run the machine, sweep the floor, put up the posters and keep the fire going, and you bet it keeps him working from 9 in the morning till 12 at night. All, or practically all Omaha operators do the janitor work. I think Omaha needs a Union. What is your view?

If you have correctly set forth the conditions I should say that Omaha's greatest need at the present time is a few theater managers. Surely things cannot be as bad as you say. $8.00 a week, working from 9 a. m. till 12 p. m? It is not very creditable of you to admit that you yourself are doing this sort of thing. You could make that much in the penitentiary. I am not going to comment on this—yet. I would not be at all bashful about expressing my opinion if I was sure these letters set forth actual facts. The conditions described are so utterly and entirely bad that I am loth to believe the writers have described things exactly as they are, though I think likely they are bad enough. If Omaha managers are placing projection in the hands of $8.00 a week "artists," and are not making money, the answer is certainly so plain that a blind man could read it. If things really are as bad, or anything like as bad as these writers assert, then some real live exhibitor could make a splendid clean-up in Omaha.

Young Operator.

Kansas writes, asking the address of the Weston Electrical Instrument Company, as he wants to get an ammeter. He then continues:

> I know, as a rule, you object to "kids" operating M. P. machines, but hope you will make some exceptions. I am one of the "kids," as I will only be 17 in November. Have been operating for a year and a half and have managed to deliver the goods, though I am not one of the know-it-alls yet. If Brother Jenkins should step into my operating room he would not find carbon butts strewn all over the floor, or the machine covered with oil, dirt and gum. He would find it clean, oiled and all there. Now please do not publish this letter as I am not trying to get into the lime-light, but merely to convince you that there should be exceptions to your rule.

No, Kansas, you have not said anything which would cause me to alter my views. The principal objection I have to very young operators is not along the lines you mention at all. The young operator may keep his machine in better condition than the older man, but the trouble lies right here; the boy, except in rare instances, has not the stability or the mental poise which comes only with the years, or should come at least. I can remember things that occurred when I was 16 or 17 and which caused me huge excitement; they would merely cause a smile now. There is no use in talking, the younger man won't admit it, it is not in the nature of things that he should, but, nevertheless, there is a certain and very marked stability of mind which is the product only of passing years. The young operator may be a good mechanic, and all of that, but his attention is easily distracted. His mind is taken up with many things. Dances, baseball, theaters, best girls, etc., are all very new to him, and mighty interesting, so that his attention is divided among a great many interests, whereas to the older man these various things are a story long since told. Therefore, they have largely ceased to interest, and his mind is in better condition to be concentrated on his work: moreover he is not likely to get excited when an accident, such as fire, occurs.

I know I have not put this very clearly, but I guess you catch the idea. There are a few, but a very few exceptions, and the young man who is the exception is not the normal young man. I have requested the Weston Electrical Instrument Company to send you their catalog.

Action Repudiated.

Although not sufficient time has passed for all of the unions to be heard from since publication of "That Law," still, up to this writing eight unions, two of them quite large ones, have written in officially repudiating the action of the convention. That is sufficient. All I wanted to know was whether or not the membership at large stood for the stone-age policy and I find they do not. As to the number of individuals who have written denouncing the action, why I kept track for a time and then gave it up.

"THE WOMAN OF THE MOUNTAINS" (Selig), Oct. 17.—This is an entertaining mountain story, the scenario being written by W. E. Wing. Good photography and splendid scenic effects are pleasing features. The story is a dramatic one, in which the secret agent of a power trust tries to blow up his rival's construction work. The suspense is good up to a certain point and then the situations were strung out somewhat and timed a little too accurately. The incline road, the hero's trip over the tramway and the girl's race over the suspension bridge were all nicely shown. This is well worth while.

"MATRIMONIAL MANOEUVRES" (Vitagraph), Oct. 17.—The plot of this offering goes over familiar ground and, as a whole, the comedy is not as successful as many produced by this company. The nephew in need of funds is financed by his aunt on condition that he introduce her to a man with a title. The nephew plays a trick on her by having a married friend pose as a Lord. The characterizations are good, being in the hands of Maurice Costello, Josie Sadler, Charles Lambart, Mary Charleson and other well-known members of this company.

"THE MATE OF THE SCHOONER SADIE" (Lubin), Oct. 17.—Not a particularly pleasant story, yet one that depicts graphically the evil of drink. The mate, whose father is a drunkard, takes his first drink on the night his engagement is announced. The hereditary taint is within him and he follows this drink with many others, finally running amuck and winding up as a suicide. The photography and acting are very good. Most of the scenes are located on the dock at San Pedro, giving views of lumber yards and freighters.

"THE TROUBLESOME TELEPHONE" (Kalem), Oct. 17.—A half-reel comedy, with John E. Brennan and Ruth Roland in the leading roles. The dentist is bothered almost every minute by calls on the telephone. Amusing demonstrations of the art of dentistry are given, but on the whole the plot is too slight to get up much interest.

"THE BOSTON FLOATING HOSPITAL" (Kalem), Oct. 17.—A series of pictures showing the manner in which Boston's poor babies are taken care of on a hospital vessel. Many views of the squalid homes from which the children are taken are also shown. Graphic pictures of a fine charitable work. On same reel with above.

"THEIR WATERLOO" (Essanay), Oct. 15.—It is worth while to watch this picture, if for nothing else than to see Minor Watson suck a lemon. The story is a farcical love affair in the country with three aspirants for the hand of Dolores. Many other country characters are introduced and somewhat confuse the action; but, at the end, all three lovers get their Waterloo in a rather rough, but clear enough way. It made laughter and seemed to please the audience.

"MASTER FIXIT" (Vitagraph), Oct. 15.—We do not dare call this picture a full success. It is not acted strongly and there is little that is truly new in its incidents. It is farcical and, in places, is pretty close to being inelegant.

"BUDDHIST TEMPLES" (Vitagraph), Oct. 15.—On the same reel with the foregoing is this series of views of temples, in place not given, but clearly in Siam or some Buddhist country near India. This part of the offering is very interesting. The great statue of Buddha called "The Leaning Buddha" is a wonder.

"AS A FATHER SPARETH HIS SON" (Selig), Oct. 15.—It is literally true that not one leading character in this picture behaves with a show of that commonsense that is usually given to mortals. In consequence, it is a tragedy, brutal and distressing, which will not appeal to the healthy minded. This is not the fault of the players, who are human and even wise in their art; nor is it the producer's fault; but the fault of the writer of its script. A very poor offering.

"THE FIANCÉE AND THE FAIRY" (Lubin), Oct. 13.—A very prettily produced fantasy in which is a girl, not perfectly satisfied with her rather unromantic fiance and who wants a lover like the picture of one of his ancestors which he shows her. She falls asleep before the painting and the fairy comes with two gifts, one to bring the picture to life to be her lover, the other to send him back again. When he comes and they go out on the lawn together they find the guests dancing the tango. The youth from long ago teaches her to dance the minuet—as by magic the costumes change and the guests are also dancing the more stately dance of not today surely. He then criticises her low-cut dress and tight skirt and soon she wishes him back where he belongs with the back numbers. The author is Clay M. Green and it was produced by L. B. Carlton.

"MRS. UPTON'S DEVICE" (Vitagraph), Oct. 13.—Mrs. Upton can not only make matches, but she can keep them lighted even in the wind of a lovers' quarrel. The story, a slight but human and pleasing one, shows this and that is all. However, it was brightly conceived by John Kendrick Bangs, competently produced by James Castle and delightfully played by Florence Dyer, one of Vitagraph's new leading women, who has self-possession, a cheery smile and is perfectly natural. Carlotta De Felice and Arthur Ashley, her two lovers, show, now and then, lack of experience, but promise well. Tefft Johnson fills a small role as Mrs. Upton's husband, and there are others who support the picture well.

"McGANN AND HIS OCTETTE" (Biograph), Oct. 13.—A farce in which William Murray plays an Irishman with eight children, and Gus Pixley, a "kike," who has him arrested, but whom the Irish judge forces to keep both McGann and his family while the former is in the pen. There was some laughter over it, especially among the Irish.

"AUNTS TOO MANY" (Biograph), Oct. 13.—On the same reel with the foregoing is this farce in which a young husband mistakes an escaped crazy woman for his wife's expected relative, and hires some actors to make a stage horse and trot her about the town. There was more laughter than over the former; but neither of them really captured the audience.

"BILL'S CAREER AS BUTLER" (Edison), Oct. 13.—This little comedy, written by Herbert Prior, has some excellent things in it and markedly pleased the audience. "Tired Bill," a tramp (Edward O'Connor), exchanges clothes with a well dressed butler (William Bechtel), who is in swimming and finds that he has a letter of recommendation to a certain man as a butler. This Bill promptly uses and, when William arrives with his protest, is in a position to kick him off the premises. But Bill's butler soon gets him into trouble and William appears again and calls the cop at a very inopportune time for him; he gets another job waiting in a prison. There are pretty scenes in the picture, full of life, of well bred distinction and perfectly photographed. Gladys Hulette and Arthur Housman add to it by their drawing of a newly wedded young couple. A good picture.

"THE HERMIT'S RUSE" (Kalem), Oct. 13.—The situation here has something of a punch; at least the villain makes us want to kick him off the place and the woman, as foolish wife, keeps to her character consistently through scenes with the villain and her husband, too. But the development, while unquestionably new, is not strong; we do not believe it and are not affected by seeing it. The hermit, played by George Williams, looks his part perfectly. Helen Holmes is the young wife of a miner, played by William Brunton, and Lee Maloney is the villain.

"HER HOUR" (Patheplay), Oct. 15.—The attention is held strongly by this picture, whose sole object is thrilling action; it puts its intention over and so makes a good offering. But it is not wholly a picture of real life and reaches no high plane. We may add that it is the most convincing picture dealing with loss of memory due to a blow on the head and final recovery years later that we remember seeing. Its worst weakness is a slight obscurity which a subtitle would have corrected.

"THE WIDOW'S SUITORS" (Edison), Oct. 15.—A farce comedy by Charles France of rural love making. The two country suitors for the affections of the very pretty widow, keeper of the restaurant, made laughter; but not continuously. The shortcoming of all such picture representations is that the camera is almost sure to catch the actor off guard, and this makes the character seem artificial. Then one would not expect to find that restaurant in a place where he would find those suitors. It is not wholly a success; but it makes a fair offering.

"RED AND PETE, PARTNERS" (Biograph), Oct. 16.—A picture in which the action never lingers. The plot is typical of Biograph product. A good many characters are introduced and then the rich woman drops a valuable necklace which the poor little girl finds. She is seen by "Red" and "Pete," two rascals who chase her home and peek in the window while her honest father is hiding it until its owner can be found. The janitress sees them and calls the cops and then we have the speedy action. It is well planned by the writer, carefully handled by the producer, who has introduced humorous incidents, and it has been humanly acted by the players.

"'A BORROWED IDENTITY" (Essanay), Oct. 16.—An acceptable love story set on a ranch in the West. At the heart of it is one of the world's best love stories, one that can be skillfully told as often as one pleases; it will always delight. In this case, it lacks the humanity that would make a great picture; but it is clear, effective and pleasing; well photographed in good backgrounds and naturally acted. A good offering.

"SCENES IN SAIGON, COCHIN CHINA" (Melies), Oct. 16.—Intimate touches of Oriental life, with sparkles of humor which brought out occasional laughter, make this a very good offering. It shows buildings, market and street scenes, with glimpses of the people, some studies of faces, people and kids. There also is one or two vocational scenes and a picture of an Annamite gutter band. The photography is fair.

"THE GOLDEN CLOUD" (Selig), Oct. 16.—The audience liked this simple, short love story. It has no frills and no padding; in other words, it minds what it is about and gets its story over. "The Golden Cloud" is the name of a mine; but the scenes are exclusively in a city and the story is told mostly in an office and in the home of the rich heroine who helps the hero out of his financial difficulties.

"THE ABDUCTION OF PINKIE" (Selig), Oct. 16.—On the same reel with the foregoing is this lively farce which made hearty laughter—both offerings of the reel were applauded. This part was used by an Essanay whole-reel picture of some months back.

"THE OUTLAW" (Vitagraph), Oct. 16.—There is real tragedy reached by this picture and it has been effectively put over by producer and players, it has a strong emotional effect on the spectators' sympathies. A crooked gambler wounded in a saloon brawl, takes refuge with the outlaw and is cared for. When well, he makes love to the outlaw's daughter, Nan; but discovering there is a big reward offered for the man's capture, he betrays him to the sheriff. After the fight, when the outlaw is lying dead, he brazens it out before the girl, who is heart-broken. Later, Nan guns for the gambler and gets him. W. Hanson Durham is the author and it was produced by Robert Thornby. Charles Bennett plays the outlaw; Margaret Gibson, his daughter, and George Cooper, the gambler. The outlaw is the best character in the picture; but every one in it does well.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 58" (October 13).—Has some excellent pictures of fine cattle, horses, bulls, cows and a prize pig. It is not a noteworthy number from the point of view of news interest, but is surely worth while.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 59" (October 16).—The great review and parade of the German army with good portraits of the royal family, including the Duchess of Cumberland, whose recent marriage and romantic circumstances surrounding it have made it especially interesting, is one item that will attract notice this mid-week. Not less worth seeing is the fine picture of the great cavalry review in Washington recently. It will make patriotic spectators glad that they are Americans. If we have to keep soldiers for self protection, it is encouraging to know that they are worthy of their uniform and flag.

"ALKALI IKE AND THE WILDMAN" (Essanay), Oct. 18.—Alkali Ike is a cowboy who agrees to masquerade as a wildman after the original one escapes from the show tent. Later, he himself flees to the woods and meets the real wildman. The situations in this are nicely photographed and it carries a lot of pleasing humor in its grotesque development. Children will be especially delighted with the two funny wildmen.

"A PLANT WITH NERVES" (Patheplay), Oct. 18.—Remarkable views of a very odd plant known as the mimosa. The plant is very sensitive and its leaves curl up when it is struck sharply. Electricity and chloroform also affect it. The demonstrations are clearly pictured.

"SAINT CLAUDE AND ITS ENVIRONS" (Patheplay), Oct. 18.—Views along a picturesque road in France, evidently taken from an automobile. Sheer cliffs, tunnels, cascades, villages and towns are encountered along the route. A good travel number. On same reel with above.

"TWICE RESCUED" (Edison), Oct. 18.—This number, written by Ashley Miller, comes nearer being a comedy-drama than straight drama. The engaged girl is twice rescued by a young man who steps in ahead of her cowardly lover. After the first incident she returns the ring to her fiance. Betty's encouragement of Alec to make love to her was a pleasing bit. The picture as a whole is pleasing in a quiet way. Bessie Learn, Arthur Housman, Harry Gripp and Mrs. Erskine appear.

"THE GIRL ACROSS THE WAY" (Biograph), Oct. 18.—An entertaining story, with some pleasing characterizations in it. The part of the young girl was particularly well handled and the fast young man was almost equally good. One scene, in the restaurant, was too frankly handled, and the young man's intentions could have been suggested a little less openly. The photography is very good and the story holds the interest well.

"THE HIGHEST BIDDER" (Lubin), Oct. 18.—The photography at the beginning of this half-reel is a little dark, but the comedy works up nicely. The part of the father was especially good and the fresh little plot is pleasing.

"SLEEPY ROMANCE" (Lubin), Oct. 18.—This, on same reel with above, is also new and enjoyable. Sleepy Si and the girl are good and even the minor characters helped the picture materially. Si goes to sleep on his wedding day and the rival marries the girl. A good split reel.

"THE RAILROAD DETECTIVE'S DILEMMA" (Kalem), Oct. 18.—A film story with an unusually tense situation of an improbable but pleasing nature. The hero, in search of box-car thieves, is bound and placed in a mail sack. The heroine, learning of his predicament, throws a stone at the man in the mail car, thus preventing him from catching the sack on the moving train. This story contains much that is unlikely, but it gets a firm hold on the attention and is excellent photographically.

"THE VAN NOSTRAND TIARA" (Biograph), October 20.—A well-handled story of sleuth and crook. It is pictured in a society setting and centers around a tiara owned by a rich woman in whose employ is a confederate of the crook who has determined to capture it. Unusually dramatic use has been made of the detective who, as the guest of the rich woman, is always near, although the jewel has not yet been stolen; he remains a potentiality which heightens the suspense a good deal. The acting and the staging are of good quality and the offering will be well liked.

"THE DUMB MESSENGER" (Kalem), October 20.—The improbability of this story, as pictured here, is such that it markedly hampers it as entertainment. The story is all right, but is one of those extremely hard to put over, for it depends upon a child and a mouse, which is made to carry a message through a speaking tube—a novel idea. Some of the scenes are beautifully photographed and the lighting, especially in the kitchen scenes, is perfect. The audience were plainly not impressed and let it be known.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 60" (October 20).—The new flag of Boston city is the most interesting item this Monday. Some good views of prize cattle are included.

"FATHER'S CHOICE" (Lubin), October 20.—A farce with a laughable idea. It is broad and somewhat rough in parts. That scene in which the father blows smoke in the face of his son's sweetheart, whom he dislikes, is inelegant. Harry Hoyt wrote the script which Arthur Hotaling produced.

"ALL ON ACCOUNT OF DAISY" (Lubin), October 20.—Parts of this offering on the same reel with the other farce tickled the audience; for, though old, it is very well handled. But it is too long. Violet Adams is the author and Arthur Hotaling produced it.

"HIRAM GREEN, DETECTIVE" (Edison), October 20.—A burlesque farce by Monte Katterjohn. Its chief character is a sissy-boy country lad (Barry O'Moore) in love with Susie (Edna Flugrath), daughter of a Jewish storekeeper (William Wadsworth). "Gink the Eel" (Yale Benner) comes to the village and tries to hold up the storekeeper, but Barry, who has purchased a "How to Be a Detective" book, is led, and in an amusing way, to the scene of the crime and frustrates him. There is much in it that is laughable, but it doesn't stand up strongly as a whole. Edward Mack, as the village constable, is the only one who deserves special mention. Charles Seay produced it. It is a servicable offering.

"REGINALD'S COURTSHIP" (Edison), October 21.—There is clever picture writing in this farce by Alice Williams. Its fun centers in Reggie (William Wadsworth), who is played as a conventional sissy-boy, but in his quite unconventional foolishness there is astonishment and compelling fun. We think that the leading role might have been played a bit more humanly, but must warmly comment the player for striking fire again and again, especially at the high points. Robert Brower is perfect as the youth's employer and Gertrude McCoy is what was wanted in the role of his daughter. Alice Washburn's work as boarding-house keeper is well known. Amy Lee and Harry Eytinge also have parts. As an offering it is a decided success. C. Jay Williams produced it.

"THE POISONED STREAM" (Patheplay), October 21.—An atmosphere of originality in the picture makes it distinctly pleasing. It tells an idyllic love story with many pretty scenes which, though clearly photographed, were worthy of more artistic camera work. The peculiar feature of the picture is its two shepherdesses. These two girls seem actual and real, yet at the same time as though they had come out of some romanza written in late Elizabethan days. The story is freshly thought out, well managed and naturally acted and it makes a creditable offering. At its end, George Gebhardt, its villain, is tarred and feathered.

"HER FIRST OFFENSE" (Lubin), October 21.—We reviewed this picture several months ago when Lubin players first produced it. It is a story of a girl who is, in the picture's end (so it seems in truth), if not commended, at least not blamed for stealing to send her consumptive brother out West. The picture we commended in the first instance for its strong human acting, which relieved it of much of its unpleasant taste.

"THE WHITE FEATHER" (Vitagraph), October 20.—This picture falls into that distinct class of photoplays showing a young man or woman with a morbid fear, due to some accident in childhood which, after a hard struggle, he or she overcomes. In this one there is freshness in its scenes and at least a substratum of humanity. It has action; is pretty well acted and has clear photography. Robert A. Sanborn is the author, but deserves no credit for plot or idea. W. J. Bauman produced it. George Cooper plays the villain creditably. The heroine is played fairly by Myrtle Gonzales and they are capably supported by Anne Shaefer, Mary McGuire and Mr. Weston.

"LUELLA'S LOVE STORY" (Vitagraph), October 21.—A commendable picture of human life by W. A. Kirkland. It tells the love story of an old maid and is designed primarily for women spectators, though its humanity cannot fail to interest all alike. The role of Luella is ably portrayed by Julia Swayne Gordon and so the offering comes as something of a treat to large numbers of picture patrons who would like to see more of this favorite's work. Tefft Johnson holds up his end with another good character drawing, the neighbor who doesn't know he loves Luella, and Mrs. Mary Maurice is excellent as her mother. With these three clearly-pictured characters the offering is certain to be a safe trump card with the people. The story has been very commendably handled throughout by L. Rogers Lytton and James Young, collaborating producers. A desirable offering.

"THE WAY PERILOUS" (Essanay), October 21.—Francis X. Bushman plays a youth who leaves a Southern home, his father (Frank Dayton) and a girl (Beverly Bayne) to make a name for himself. He gets into fast company and loses heavily. His temptation to "raise" a check from his father is freshly and cleverly shown and the full value to the picture of his crime is established without the loss of motion. There is little real substance to the story as such at this stage of the game, but it had been so produced as to keep the artificial parts in the background and to accent what there is of human truth in it. The offering will interest and is surely serviceable.

"DISHWASHER DICK'S COUNTERFEIT" (Selig), October 21.—A ranch farce with a very old situation that seemed to please the audience; there was considerable laughter. It is snappily produced and the players (Myrtle Steadman and the company usually with William Duncan, who is missed from it) do their work well. It is the kind of offering that bores no one and amuses the many very well. Such are very servicable offerings.

"SURF AND SUNSET ON THE INDIAN OCEAN" (Selig), October 21.—Last a few feet. The sunset picture is well worth seeing.

Licensed Specials.

"THE BRIDGE OF SHADOW" (Selig), Oct. 13.—A two part offering that has already been reviewed at length in this paper—see page 26, issue of Oct. 4, 1913.

"THE VAMPIRE" (Kalem), Oct. 15.—A sensational dance by Bert French and Alice Eis, which represents in a strangely graphic way a vampire coming out of the woods to destroy a young artist, is featured in this three-part picture. The dance is truly a part of the story, not merely woven in it. Moreover, the story had been carefully done all through and, except in one spot where it seems forced, is human and convincing. Harry Millarde and Marguerite Courtot play two country lovers. Harry is the first to leave the farm, and his course from his early success through his ruin, due to a woman dressed in close fitting silver silk (Alice Hollister), who picks him up in a fashionable restaurant, and his final regeneration after seeing the "Vampire Dance," is shown. The effect of his final meeting with the woman of the white lights seems forced. After he has once more made a man of himself, Harry meets Marguerite again. There is nothing in the offering that is not healthy and commendable and it seems likely to please widely. It is well acted and in photography is, for the most part, above criticism

"THE HAUNTS OF FEAR" (Patheplay), October 16.—A picture in two parts of both East and West that leaves a deep impression. Its hero is an innocent man accused of crime who, escaping to the West, lives in a lonely cabin. He finds and brings to his home a girl, the sole survivor of an Indian massacre, whose memory has been clouded by the experience. She doesn't know who she is, but lives with the refugee as his sister until a circuit preacher suggests that he ought to marry her, which is done at once. The method of clearing the man of the charge of the crime by the finding of the true culprit dead with the evidence on him (we are aware that the rescued girl was the villain's wife, but she doesn't know it yet); the bringing of the hero and his wife home and the recovery of her memory, make an absorbing story. The woman at first thinks she is an unintentional bigamist, and her finding the truth makes the pleasant ending. There is some weakness in the acting of this scene, but, as a whole, the picture is held up very well. The last act made tremendous demands on the genius of the player who took the woman's role.

"THE TAKING OF RATTLESNAKE BILL" (Lubin), October 16.—The story told by this picture is well introduced to make the final "taking" of that redoubtable highwayman, R. Bill, seem convincing. He is a character well known and often applauded—an outlaw with a heart of gold that shows plainly whenever he smiles and he smiles often. Moreover, he is afraid of nothing, including the sheriff and a barroom full of posse material. Then it is shown that no woman ever pleaded to him in vain; he is a direct lineal descendant of medieval paladins and doughty knights of the wood, like Robin Hood—popular heroes all! A perfectly acted drunken stage driver lets a child, daughter of the sheriff, get lost. Out in the wilds for hours she is overcome by exposure and is found very sick, by Rattlesnake Bill. It is his solicitude for the safety of the child that leads to his capture by the sheriff, whom he might have killed had he not feared to awaken the patient suddenly, which the doctor, he had risked getting warned here would prove fatal. The hero's role is perfectly suggested by John Ince, who is also the producer. The sheriff (William [illegible]) has a refreshingly human countenance in the picture and is natural in his acting. Billy R[illegible]esher, the stage driver, in a perfectly simulated drunk, added much to amuse the audience and make the offering convincing. E. C. Hall wrote the script.

"BRONCHO BILLY GETS SQUARE" (Essanay), Oct. 17.—This story is strongly presented, but it is unfortunate in its beginning, as it depicts Broncho Billy as an outlaw and the subsequent scenes tend to make a hero of him. If his pal had fastened a crime committed by himself on Billy, the latter would have gained more sympathy. The scenes are typical Western ones, the most dramatic being the burning of the cabin and the final one where Billy has the squaw put a stop to his former pal's wedding.

"THE FOREMAN'S TREACHERY" (Edison), Oct. 17.—An excellent film story in two reels, written by Anne and Bannister Merwin and directed by Charles Brabin. The scenes are laid in Wales and are of characteristic beauty. The photography is unusually smooth and attractive. The plot is a strong one and there are several good examples of character work, particularly those of Leslie Oswell as the half wit and Douglas Munro as the miser. Marc MacDermott plays the hero, Charles Vernon the scheming foreman, and Miriam Nesbitt the girl. A particularly pleasing release.

"THE PIRATES" (Vitagraph), Oct. 18.—A highly diverting two-reel subject by James Oliver Curwood. This starts out as a mystery, and the mystery is maintained till the last, but it is relieved by much pleasing comedy. The scenes in the second reel, where the prisoners take a dip in the ocean, were very funny. John Bunny, Clara Kimball Young and Robert Gaillord play the leading roles. The mysterious prisoners turn out to be the board of directors of the "Eat-um" Biscuit Company in search of free advertising, which they get. Very enjoyable.

"THE FINGER PRINT" (Selig), October 20.—This picture was watched by the audience with marked attention. It shows how a crime came to be committed, how the suspicion of guilt is fastened on the most commendable man in the story and how the "great detective" (played by Charles Clary) unravels the difficulty and brings the guilty one to justice. One marked feature of it is the disguise of the detective, which the average person will not see through until the mask is removed. It is not a perfectly convincing picture, but it holds the attention strongly and can be safely relied on to furnish acceptable entertainment. Arthur P. Hankins is the author and Oscar Eagle produced it. Jack Nelson plays the hero; Winnifred Greenwood, the girl; Normal Fowler, the rival, and LaFayette McKee, the cook. Mrs. Louise Kelley plays the mother of the hero and Rosa Evans, the mother of the rival. George Cox is the lawyer arguing in the trial scene. There is good team work and the picture is pretty successfully "put over."

"THE WHEELS OF JUSTICE" (Cines), October 2[illegible].—A picture that might have been taken from some elaborately planned novel. The plot is complicated, yet, after the first few scenes, the story is clear and it holds the interest. One is not carried away by anything that happens, even by the wrecking of a bridge which is very realistic, except in the attitude of the players who stood near by. So, in the story, while it absorbs the mind waiting for the outcome of the tangle, there is very often a part that isn't believed. The backgrounds add to the value of the [illegible] and there is much artistic quality in the arrangement and management of the scenes. On the whole, it is a good offering.

Independent

"FISHERMAN'S LUCK" (Solax), Oct. 17.—The Solax camera man, who is worthy of all the compliments we can give him, has made some lovely water scenes in picturing this light and pleasing farce. It is set in vacation land and there are two camps. In one, four married men live with their wives and, in the other, there are four unmarried college girls who don't know the four men are married, have been assured they are not. The wives, of course, don't know of the girls, though the men are flirting terribly with them; but they find it out all right and there's trouble for the men, but fun for the audience. It is done in a sprightly way and makes a good offering.

"THE BOOB'S DREAM GIRL" (Rex), Nov. 9.—An entertaining number, featuring Robert Leonard and Marguerita Fischer. Leonard appears as an amateur sleuth. He locks the real detective in a shed and recovers the stolen jewels himself. A story of considerable interest, but the final disposition of the detective was not shown.

"LOVE, LUCK AND A PAINT BRUSH" (Nestor), Nov. 10.—This makes a very pleasing comedy number, with Eddie Lyons in the role of a young artist whose paintings will not sell. Through an error the morning papers print news of his death. His contest painting wins a big prize and there are great demands for his work. An idea similar to this has been used before on the screen. In the end Eddie gets fabulous sums of money and also the girl he loves.

"HIS WIFE'S BURGLAR" (Nestor), Nov. 7.—A good farcical situation is worked up in this offering. The husband pretends to be a burglar to cure his nervous wife of her constant apprehension. A real burglar appears on the scene, likewise Mr. Smith, who lives next door, and the resulting developments bring considerable laughter.

"JEWELS OF SACRIFICE" (Rex), Nov. 2.—This picture will interest, and especially so those religiously inclined. It is a story of a woman who, when her child is near death, promises that if the life of her little one be spared she will sacrifice her jewels. The child recovers, and the mother fulfills her promise, helping those in danger and in trouble until the jewels are gone. Pauline Bush plays the mother; her work is reverent and artistic.

"CROSS PURPOSES" (Powers), Nov. 8.—Wallace Reid and Cleo Madison, playing the parts respectively of the boy and the girl, who refuse to marry one another as their parents had planned, handle their parts well in this entertaining comedy of misunderstandings to begin with and complete happiness to end with. The story will be widely appreciated.

"ALMOST AN ACTRESS" (Imp), Nov. 8.—A very laughable production of the low comedy type, full of chuckles and free from offense. It has to do with a stage struck girl who wants to break into the "movies." The scenes are all of burlesque nature and furnish plenty of genuine amusement.

"HIS PAL'S REQUEST" (Rex), Nov. 3.—A purely melodramatic offering, with a very light plot. Certain parts seemed to be miscast, and there was a great deal of ineffective acting. The story concerns a young girl left by her father in charge of his former friend.

"THROWING THE BULL" (Joker), Nov. 1.—A burlesque offering, in a Mexican setting. The humor is of a coarse-grained variety and not of any particular appeal. The Battle of Chili Con Carne was well worked up and the scenes in the bull ring were rather amusing. There is nothing offensive in this, with the possible exception of the slangy title.

"A TALE OF DE-FEET" (Eclair), Nov. 2.—A comedy showing many feet which go through many antics, suggesting a story of a bibulous husband and his Nemesis, his wife. This will win a laugh.

"TINY ORGANISMS WHICH INHABIT STAGNANT PONDS" (Eclair), Nov. 2.—On the same reel as the above is this natural history subject. Its title explains the picture, a very good one.

"FOR MOTHER'S SAKE" (Kay-Bee), Nov. 7.—Film stories in which the leading character commits a crime because of love for his mother or his wife are never very convincing. In this case Jim steals money because his mother wants to make a trip back East, giving an instance of mixed motives. Tom saves him from arrest and the crime is never properly accounted for, as it should have been.

"WHEN SPIRITS WALK" (Frontier), Oct. 30.—A haunted house film story which starts out in the conventional way, the girl agreeing to marry her lover if he will remain over night in the place. The cook is a sleepwalker and the young people who impersonate ghosts are much alarmed when they run across her. The scene in the house works up very humorously and there are a number of laughs in this.

"THE PRIMEVAL TEST" (Rex), November 6.—Marguerita Fisher as the neglected wife of Stannard, a very busy business man, plays a first rate lead in this two-reel drama, which illustrates the doubtful truth that a woman's love is won and kept by force. As shown in this picture, the husband, on the evidence of an old friend, employs stone age tactics and we see the couple reunited in that primitive atmosphere. The story is simple and clearly presented and the film ought to be well received.

"FOR OLD LOVE'S SAKE" (Victor), October 24.—This is a rather sentimental drama, but will have a wide appeal. Characterization of the young farmer whose sweetheart jilts him for a city man is good. The girl's choice proves unfortunate; she dies and leaves a son, who falls into evil hands, from which her old sweetheart, after some interesting adventures, rescues him and adopts him.

"GIRLS WILL BE BOYS" (Crystal), November 4.—In which Pearl White and Chester Barnett and two others appear as a quartet of sweethearts in a short comedy wringing most of its fun out of some disguises which the girls assume. The fun is wholesome.

"IT'S A SHAME TO TAKE THE MONEY" (Crystal), November 4.—Sharing the above reel is this merry farce picturing the capitulation of an irate "paw" who refuses to give his consent to his son's wooing. The plot is ingenious.

"WHEN DUTY CALLS" (Crystal), November 9.—In this melodrama is revealed the situation in which a girl's sweetheart is in duty bound to arrest her brother for theft. The story is well presented.

"THE OLD FOLKS AT HOME" (Thanhouser), Oct. 24.—The son in the city writes to his parents to come and live with his family. The old folks go to the metropolis, but after several social experiences decide to go back home again. The characterizations are good and the story, while not very new, is pleasing.

"THE OVERALL OUTING" (Komic), Oct. 9.—The girls dress up as boys to go on a picnic. The boys frighten them away with a scarecrow and steal the food. Good photography helps out this rather ordinary comedy half reel.

"DOBBS FORGOT THE COAL" (Keystone), Oct. [illegible]—Dobbs starts down town to order coal for his wife. He eclipses all former records in getting into trouble and arrives back home almost a wreck. On same reel with above. Some good laughs in this.

"A WOMAN'S WIT" (Kay-Bee), Oct. 24.—There is a strong plot in this picture, but it does not [illegible]. It was little short of murder for the woman and her husband to [illegible] the gambler [illegible] be shot for a crime the husband himself attempted. The chief strength of the picture is its faithful rendering of Western atmosphere in the early days.

"IT HAPPENED IN HAVERSTRAW" (Reliance), Oct. 2[illegible].—Another animated statue film, this time done a little better than usual. The hero agrees to pose in place of the broken statue. The girl first discovers the deception and later her father does likewise, but of course in the end he is forgiven and all ends happily.

"BORROWED GOLD" (Kay-Bee), Oct. 31.—A one-reel story by Richard V. Spencer, in which the situations seemed greatly overdrawn. The wife, because her husband is ill, dresses up as a man and holds up the stage. The crime is traced to her door, but the sheriff relents when he sees that her husband is dying and makes no arrest. The good photography is the strongest feature of this particular offering.

"THROUGH THE SLUICE GATES" (Majestic), Oct. 19.—A film story that will appeal to many observers, not alone for its dashing love story, but because it illustrates so well what a sluice is and just how it operates. William Garwood is the hero of the piece, and with the aid of the girl escapes from prison and thence through the sluiceway, which was filled with running water. Something new and attractively pictured.

"VENGEANCE" (Majestic), Oct. 2[illegible].—A modern version of the plot made familiar by Poe and other writers, in which a human being is walled up in brickwork. This picture story is too improbable and too hastily constructed to get this situation strongly before the observer, but at the same time it serves to hold the attention and is well photographed. The hero arrives in time to thwart the Italian banker and get the girl out of the wall alive.

"HOW PHILMY WON HIS SWEETHEART" (Thanhouser), Oct. 28.—There are quite a few smiles tucked away in this offering, in which Riley Chamberlin appears as a cameraman. This shows a moving picture within a moving picture, all of the action taking place backward in one of them. Philmy finally makes enough money to win back his girl. A very fair comedy.

"FOLLIES OF A DAY AND NIGHT" (American), Nov. 1.—This shows the mishaps of Mr. E. Z. Smithers, who desires to get thirty days in jail, hoping his wife will then divorce him. He is finally cast in jail, after many funny attempts, but his wife writes that she will return to him when he gets out. The photography is good and altogether this makes quite a pleasing comedy offering. George Field plays Smithers very effectively.

"THE STEP-BROTHERS" (American), Oct. 23.—This plot is on the made-to-order plan and has not enough freshness about it to make it very strong. The step-brothers run for sheriff; one is elected and the other plans a holdup; then the first is blamed, but finally cleared. Too familiar to hold the attention well.

"IN THREE HOURS" (American), Oct. 30.—An obvious plot, with one scene so strongly overacted and melodramatic as to be almost a burlesque. Joe is tied to a tree, with a lighted candle on a can of powder near it. He has but three hours to live, but of course his sweetheart arrives in time to save him. Good photography and pleasing outdoor scenery are the best points in this production.

"THE HEART OF THE ROSE" (Reliance), Oct. 22.—This story by Sidney Rosenfeld does not make a very strong offering. Rosemary Theby was very attractive in the leading part, but the emotional scene where she stabs herself and places a drop of blood in the rose was too melodramatic. The situations lacked real feeling, and portions of the film were none too clear photographically.

"HIDDEN TREASURE RANCH" (American), Oct. 20.—An interesting subject laid in the West, with Warren Kerrigan in the role of a young spiritualist. The cowboys put up a job on him by "planting" the crazy miner's map near a big stone. The joke is on the cowboys, however, as a real treasure is turned up. The closing scenes were hurried, but the story is more original than many recent Western offerings.

"ALWAYS TOGETHER" (Majestic), Oct. 21.—This story has a very light plot, with some fairly humorous situations in it. The old Irishman insists on taking his pet goat with him into society when he suddenly finds himself a millionaire. The daughter objects, but he finally wins over her former affection for the animal. Fairly entertaining.

"HIS CONSCIENCE" (Frontier), Nov. 1.—The title will give a good idea of the subject matter herein contained; the scene is laid in the West; the man whose conscience troubles him is one of two rival suitors for a girl and he is thereby saved the double crime of theft and murder. The photography is good.

"O, YOU PEARL" (Crystal), Nov. 11.—A man steals a coat containing another's letter of introduction to a possible wife in this brisk little comedy and starts the ball of fun to rolling.

'BABY BELMONT WINS A PRIZE" (Crystal), Nov. 11.—A very thin, angular, old maid in this farce comedy has no lovers until she inherits thirty thousand dollars and then she becomes very popular.

Independent Specials

"THE TEMPTATION OF JANE" (Imp), Nov. 3.—Jane Gail as the hallroom girl, who becomes an artist's model, and Geo. L. Tucker, as the profligate rich man, who tries first to mislead her and then falls in love with her, plays the leads and are well assisted in this two-reel production which casts an interesting light on a young girl's struggle to exist in a great metropolis. The scene in which Jane refuses the costly dresses, sent her as gifts from the profligate, and the scenes in which she appears at his party, given in honor of her birthday, are particularly to be commended.

"THE SPENDER" (Victor), Oct. 31.—Florence Lawrence gives a good rendition of the heroine, a vaudeville actress who, for love of a young man noted for his heavy spending, cures him of his spendthrift habits in this excellent two-reel comedy characterized by good acting, very human situations and a fine thread of sentimentality which runs throughout the whole production. It is a first-rate offering.

"HIS UNKNOWN BROTHER" (Great Northern).—This three-part offering is not acted with that skill and feeling for character that we expect in pictures with the Great Northern trade mark. There is also some lack of skill noticeable in the writing of the script, especially in its introduction of the story. The story is very fair and the picture is by no means without appeal. It has some excellent circus pictures and, at the end, an accident in which two acrobats, a man and a woman, are severely injured. The man had fallen from a trapeze and was hanging by one foot. The woman who had once been his partner in an acrobatic sketch in the circus, in trying to rescue him, is hurt by a second fall of both together. This accident clears up the story, proving that the injured acrobat and the man he was jealous of are brothers, who were separated in their youth.

"THE CURRENT" (Ramo).—A very well acted and interesting melodrama in three parts. The first two reels tell a straightforward story with not much complication; but with plenty of excellent action and give us the adventures of a brother, a dissipated young man, and his sister in New York. They had left the farm at different times and for different reasons and have lost track of each other. The plot becomes extremely complicated in the third reel, the "current" here runs in tortuous channels, full of eddies and whirlpools in which we fear our heroine, with whom we are in deep sympathy, will be submerged just as she is gaining well deserved happiness; but it all turns out well in the end. Lois Howard plays the heroine to win the hearts of the audience; Stewart Holmes draws a typical villain; Will Davis makes himself look as weak as water in the role of brother until his regeneration at the end; and Jack Hopkins plays the role of Lois's lover. We are used to seeing him in a villain's part and expected him to behave differently. It is clearly photographed.

"IN THE DAYS OF TRAJAN" (American), Oct. 27.—Except for the battle scenes, which may be easily shortened or eliminated entirely, this is one of the best two-reel subjects the American Company has produced. The combatants were too few to make a good battle scene and the vision of the dead for some reason brought laughter. But in point of exquisite settings, good photography and pleasing characterizations, the production is very successful. The costuming is also excellent, dating back to 100 A. D. J. Warren Kerrigan has seldom appeared to better advantage than as Decebalus, the Dacian, who was cast into the arena at the command of the Roman Emperor. The story is entertaining and in keeping with the period, the entire American company appearing.

"DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND" (Bison), Oct. 28.—This story deals with two professional criminals, played by Grace Cunard and Francis Ford. The photography is clear and the scenes hold the interest in spite of a certain vagueness in the plot at the close of the first reel. In the end the woman thief saves the man by replacing the stolen jewels and both reform and start married life on a limited sum of money.

"WIDOW MALONEY'S FAITH" (Domino), Oct. 30.—A two-reel Irish story by William H. Clifford. This offering tells an entertaining yarn and does not fall into the usual run of Irish plays. Danny is a self-reliant youth, whose rival attempts to have him mobbed. Danny cleans up the entire gang with his fists. Later he is drugged and placed upon a whaler. He finds some ambergris on a desert island and comes back wealthy. He gets a wholesome revenge on his enemies and the story works up to a good climax. A good Irish story.

"FROM DAWN TILL DARK" (Bison), Nov. 1.—A two-reel offering, with Francis Ford and Grace Cunard in the leading roles. The story is a Western one and contains many well-chosen outdoor scenes of an attractive nature. The hero is drugged by his rival, locked up in a room at the fort. When the Indian attack is waging, he escapes. The girl watches him through the telescope, battling with the redskins single handed. The girl seemed to occupy a very exposed position while doing this. After much carnage the hero is killed. A sensational film of about average interest.

"THE RAID OF THE HUMAN TIGERS" (Bison), Nov. 4.—It is too bad that the story in this three-reel production is not up to the settings and the very materials out of which the story is made. As it is, the picture holds the attention by sheer force of interest in its splendid scenes. The drama is set in East India and we are given a pretty good idea of the life there in the jungle wild, the savage hillmen, the caravans, and the soldiers which appear in the picture. On the whole, the production is a fair offering.

"THE VETERAN" (Broncho), Nov. 5.—One of the best releases from the standpoint of pathos and heart interest seen recently. The veteran returns home from the banquet with his comrades, carrying food for his wife inside his coat. He finds her dead in her chair. The scenes are true to life and sufficiently probable to make an effective situation. The veteran and his wife were finely human characters and the banquet scenes were apparently taken at a real Soldiers' Home—a genuinely pathetic two-reel production.

"THE PRAIRIE TRAIL" (Bison), Nov. 9.—This is a story of illicit whisky trade with the Indians, told in two interesting, carefully produced reels. Many Indians and frontier soldiers appear and for a novel turn to the situations we are shown a running fight between the soldiers on a train and the Indians on horseback. The Indian maid, hopelessly in love with the young army officer who is engaged to the Colonel's daughter, is charmingly portrayed.

"SECRET OF THE OLD CABINET" (Great Northern).—If these four reels had been condensed to two or even three it would have made for the improvement of the interest of the picture. The photography is of the usual rare Great Northern quality. There are fine views of ocean, cliff and field. A rescue is made of a child that has fallen down a precipice. A machine is thrown over an embankment and wrecked. There are other sensational incidents. The picture will please many.

"In the Power of the Hypnotist"

A Strong Three-Part Gauntier Players' Picture Recently Released by Warner's Features.

By George Blaisdell.

THOSE who are inclined to look with skepticism on a sensational picture for fear it will be lacking in dramatic quality may approach this splendid production of the Gene Gauntier Players with pleasurable anticipation. The story, it is fair to assume, is written by Miss Gauntier. It has the holding power of her best work. Also it must have been written with knowledge of the unusual hypnotic ability possessed by Sidney Olcott, the director of the company. The honors of the production go to Mr. Olcott for his powerful portrayal of the role of the traveling charlatan who wields so evil a spell over those under his influence. Miss Gauntier, in the part of the girl and woman who is unable to resist his will, as masterful as it is evil, does fine work. Jack Clark, as detective, contributes to the strength of the picture.

The story "gets" you right at the beginning, when Professor Gondorza, "the world's greatest hypnotist," gives an exhibition of his powers. It is the scene so familiar to those of smaller communities. The entertainer has invited to the stage persons from the floor to act as subjects. In this instance the quartet are hypnotized. They are not actors. No veteran player was ever more unconscious of the camera. One of the subjects is turned into a bridge between chairs, his head and heels forming the ends; the professor stands on the rigid human. This one action gives the story atmosphere enough to carry any picture far beyond three reels. At the conclusion of the show the "professor" is set upon by his audience when he uses roughly a child traveling with him. The hypnotist runs away, but he is caught. We see him later run out of town attired in a thin coating of tar and feathers, after a ride on a rail. The child is adopted by Judge White.

Scene from "In the Power of the Hypnotist"

Ten years later the man returns to the town as Dr. Ferdez, with a troupe of negro performers and selling Indian remedies. He sees the child now grown to young womanhood. He puts her under his spell; he compels her to bring him jewelry from her home. A detective is called in. He falls in love with the young woman. One night he surprises her rifling a treasure chest. He resigns the case.

A little later, under dramatic circumstances, the detective meets the girl at the seashore, where she has gone by the hypnotist's direction, to commit a robbery. The girl is saved from arrest, but eludes the detective later. It is four years before she is again heard from. The foster father and the detective see a poster of a performance by Mlle. Renault and M. Gaspard. They recognize the two. From a box that evening they see the girl come on the stage with a snake twined about her throat. The old charlatan drops dead. The snake tightens its coils. The two men in the box rush on the stage as panic ensues. The ending is a happy one.

It is not easy in brief form to indicate the strength of the many good situations. Over nearly all of them is the influence of the diabolical hypnotist. There are the love passages between the detective and the daughter of the household, the dramatic scene in the hotel when the detective interrupts the robbery, and the thrilling denouement on the stage. The settings are realistic, especially the big theater scene, in which is a full orchestra. The whole picture is well done—from all angles.

OUR friend herewith reproduced is Charles A. Calehuff, president and general manager of the well-known Calehuff Supply Company, which for some years past has been located at 50 North Eight Street, Philadelphia, Pa., and experienced such an extensive increase in volume of business as to necessitate newer and more up-to-date quarters, has leased the handsome store property at the corner of Thirteenth and Race Streets, where it will have in future many added advantages and facilities at hand which were heretofore lacking and which will now enable it to carry on its large and important business even more expeditiously and promptly than before. To his personal friends Mr. Calehuff is known as the gentleman farmer, on account of the beautiful sixty-acre farm he owns just outside of Philadelphia. Besides enjoying the reputation of being one of the best shots in his location, Calehuff is recognized as one of the best horsemen in Philadelphia.

Here's a good one, and it is the truth, too.

Sol Lesser, the biggest film renter on the coast, after a recent trip to New York, met Charles Feature Abrams and told him of interest in the Moving Picture World thusly: On his way East, the train stopped at Omaha, and Lesser wanted to get the current issue of the paper. After being disappointed at not getting the paper in or near the station, he was informed that he had plenty of time as the train lay over for twenty minutes, so at the cost of $1.60 he hired a taxi and journeyed to the center of the city, where he found and purchased two copies. That's going some, isn't it? $1.80 for two copies. MAC.

HOW "QUO VADIS?" IS BILLED.

The illustration herewith gives a partial idea of how George Kleine's "Quo Vadis?" is being billed throughout the country. The cut shows the corner of Fulton Street and Fourth Avenue, at the entrance to Golden Gate Park, San Francisco. Photograph was taken August 3, 1913.

A RECRUIT FROM THE LEGITIMATE.

Leonora von Ottinger is a recent addition to the Universal Company. She is to appear in second leads and heavies in the Lawrence-Victor releases. Miss von Ottinger is a beautiful woman and a finished actress, having appeared in, besides many other notable roles, the role of Baroness Revandel in Zangwill's famous success, "The Melting Pot." She has had several years of stock experience, aside from the other, both in Boston and Philadelphia, all of which makes her a valuable asset to the Victor Company.

"THE RATTLESNAKE" (Lubin).

This strange and weird story will make it a popular sensation. It savors somewhat of snake charming, but the types are true to the Mexican race, and although the commencement of the play is rather terrible, the denouement is a beautiful picture of peace and happiness. It employs the pick of the clever players of the Lubin New Mexico company.

Tony, a young Mexican, sweetheart of Inez, finds Jose making love to her. He chides Jose, who lays in wait for his rival; from a high cliff he drops a stone which renders Tony insensible. Jose descends and is about to kill him with his dagger when a huge rattlesnake strikes the would-be assassin in the leg. As Tony recovers consciousness Jose runs for a mud hole. Without fear Tony gathers up the snake, taking it to his bosom. Following his rival he sees him expire in agony. Jack Gordon, an American surveyor, has met Inez and asked her to direct him to the mine, on their way they hear Tony laughing hysterically and on coming up find him and the dead body of Jose. Leaving the surveyor's assistant to bury the body they proceed to the mine. Tony takes the reptile's characteristics and is anything but human. Inez refuses to marry Tony unless he kills the snake and eventually marries the American and they have a little girl baby. Tony then seeks revenge on the American and one night enters the house and puts the snake in Gordon's bed. Jack, however, sees Tony escaping through the window and pursues him. The demented one returns and finds that Inez has put her child in the bed, he secures the snake and kills it, after which his reason returns. There is a happy reunion and we see happy Tony caressing Inez's child.

Scene from "The Rattlesnake" (Lubin).

WALTER MACNAMARA TO DIRECT FOR IMP.

Walter MacNamara is the latest to be added to the staff of Universal directors. For the past year he has been connected with the Universal as special photoplay writer and for the past few months has been acting in the double capacity of assistant-director and author. Mr. MacNamara has had a notable record as a film author, having turned out scores of successes, practically creating the Binks series. He has written King Baggot successes and most of the later successes of Miss Jane Gail.

MYRTLE STEDMAN AT LIBERTY.

Miss Myrtle Stedman, leading lady for one of the Selig Western companies for the past three years, has closed her engagement with that firm. Miss Stedman has gone to Los Angeles, where she will be pleased to consider offers. As no definite address is given, it is to presumed that letters addressed to general delivery will reach her.

"THE COUNT OF MONTE CRISTO" (Famous Players).

James O'Neill, the famous romantic actor and interpreter of the leading character in "The Count of Monte Cristo," has perpetuated his portrayal by means of the motion picture. Few stories are better known or more popular than this stirring human tale of Dumas, and perhaps no other fiction character has made such a lasting impression on all the reading races of the world as the leading figure of this great work.

The announcement that "The Count of Monte Cristo" has been produced in motion pictures, to be released by the Famous Players' Film Company, November 1st, possesses more than a literary importance, aside from the fact that the story, which has been translated in every modern tongue, is now presented in the universal language of pictures. But added to this distinction is the prestige lent by the fact that the guiding character of this masterful tale as portrayed by its greatest interpreter, will now illustrate his strange career through the vivid and faithful agency of the film.

Scene from "The Count of Monte Cristo" (Famous Players).

All the hopes and despairs experienced by the honest sailor lad whom fate torments and tortures, all his dreams and desires and defeats, are typified by Mr. O'Neill's vigorous art until they develop into a semblance of the moving emotions that Dumas intended to weave into the story, and with which he so capably succeeded in surrounding his character.

KINEMACOLOR'S CHEAPER SERVICE.

In connection with the new film service proposition being offered to exhibitors by the Kinemacolor Company of America, it was stated this week that the company is offering for sale the Kinemacolor machine. Up to this time these machines have always been leased, remaining the property of the Kinemacolor Company. This has made it practically impossible for the exhibitor in the smaller towns to secure the special Kinemacolor productions, such as "The Durbar," "Balkan War," "Panama Canal," "Weber and Fields Series," etc.

Under the new system, any theater having a Kinemacolor machine installed will be enabled to rent special features from the company, immediately they are released, and at a much lower figure than would be possible if it were necessary for the company to send special machine, operator and outfit to play a date.

Another innovation in Kinemacolor service is that exhibitors buying machines are not required to contract for any special term of service, but may buy their service in the same manner they have been accustomed to buy any special film service, either by the day or week.

"A FAMILY MIXUP" (Great Northern).

In this comedy we have several elements of tragedy, but as it is a domestic affair, pure and simple, everything is straightened out and all ends merrily. In the opening of the story we are made aware that Mr. Newlywed has asked his wife to call at the jeweler's for his watch which he has left for repairs. Before doing so she visits a girl friend and borrows an illustrated paper. Within its covers is a letter her friend has received from her fiancee making an appointment. The husband finds the note and assuming that his wife is unfaithful, follows her to the house of the girl friend. Here she borrows a raincoat, and going out again is not recognized by her husband. Hubby then mistakes her friend for his spouse and witnesses the meeting. When they drive away in a taxicab he hails another and follows them. In reality Jack is taking Doris to his parents to introduce as his fiancee. In the midst of the congratulations, in rushes the irate hubby and exclaims that "your son's sweetheart is my wife." Matters are set to right, however, when Mrs. Newlywed appears upon the scene, who has followed hubby. All's well that ends well, and everyone congratulates the future bride and bridegroom.

Scene from "A Family Mixup" (Gt. Northern).

EXHIBITORS STRONG FOR AMERICAN "SAPHO."

Herman Smidt, manager of the De Luxe Feature Film Company, of 71 West 23rd Street, New York, which firm controls the New York exhibiting rights to the American-made five-reel "Sapho," says that the demand for this feature is so strong that he will have to buy his fourth copy of it to satisfy his customers. It seems to be one of the most satisfactory and sure-fire success that has appeared. Mr. Smidt has any number of voluntary testimonials. Here is part of one from Mr. S. E. Rose, manager of the Tremont Theater, New York City:

"Kindly allow me to congratulate you on your wonderful production of 'Sapho.' It certainly is one of the most beautiful pictures I have ever had at my theater, and as a drawing card it has no equal. As you know it is no cinch to fill a 1,000-seat theater three days in succession as I did with 'Sapho.' If I am not asking too much, I would like to know when I can play a return date, as I have had many requests to play it again."

Another testimonial from George Bachy, manager of the Yorkville Hippodrome, New York City, reads, in part, as follows:

"I want to extend you my sincere thanks for your kindness in granting me such an early date for your picture, 'Sapho.' I must say that it is one of the most wonderful productions of the present day and it certainly did draw a big crowd. I was unable to accommodate the crowd, who actually fought for admission. I would consider it a great favor if you will grant me an early return date. I can hardly express my feelings regarding the enormous success this picture has made, but can say without exaggeration that it was the biggest day for receipts that I ever had."

KLEINE USING A POWER'S 6A.

George Kleine's big spectacular production, "The Last Days of Pompeii," now running at the Bijou Theater, is being projected by a Power's 6a machine, giving four performances each day. Good business is reported.

"THE GAMBLER'S RUIN" (Gaumont).

Scientific detection of crime is the underlying motive of the Gaumont subject "The Gambler's Ruin." Although it is worked out in a somewhat fanciful form the theory provides material for a rather interesting, though tragic picture. According to the story, Peter Thurston starts in betting on horse races and is ruined financially. His wife and father cast him off and he reaches the lowest depth of degredation turning finally to burglary as a means of obtaining a bare existence. Singularly one of his predatory excursions brings him to the home of his wife and the shock of recognition causes her death. Known to the police as the "Curly Giant," Thurston is arrested.

Scene from "The Gambler's Ruin" (Gaumont).

About this time Professor Thurston has completed his experiments with his theory that the influence of "H" rays of electricity will cause the impression of the object grasped by a thief to appear upon the thief's hand. While placing no value upon the theory the police consent to the professor's experiment in this case. The result is successful, but Professor Thurston recognizes the thief as his son and realizes that he has been the means of fixing the crime upon him.

"THE COLONEL'S OATH" (Reliance).

A number of strong situations supplemented by an abundance of heart interest is the secret of the high dramatic value of "The Colonel's Oath" scheduled for release on November 1st. The Colonel, a southerner of the old school, swears that if his son marries his northern sweetheart none of his blood shall ever enter the old homestead. The marriage takes place and the high spirited northern girl meets the Colonel's oath with an oath of her own to the same effect.

Scene from "The Colonel's Oath" (Reliance).

The son dies leaving a beautiful golden haired baby daughter, who, unknown to her mother, becomes acquainted with the Colonel and wins his heart completely. He is ready to recall his oath but his northern daughter-in-law stands firm. Here a situation is presented, the equal of which, for strong heart appeal and intense human interest, rarely is found in a single reel photodrama.

"THE TOLL OF THE MARSHES" (Essanay).

The curse of the scheming land agent, and the harvest death reaps, because of his treachery is graphically told in this two reel production which is scheduled for release Friday, October 31st. Francis X. Bushman assumes the leading role of the widow's (Helen Dunbar), son, whose ambition to become a possessor of a farm, leads him to the offices of crooked land agents. The story is rich with dramatic situations and human interest scenes; that natural appeal which makes it an interesting photoplay of merit

Scene from "The Toll of the Marshes" (Essanay.)

The trusting simplicity of the youth, the natural distrust of the mother, whose feminine instinct warns her against the purchase and the final results, when the son finds the land agent's (Frank Dayton), young daughter mired in the swamps, and through his heroic efforts grasps her from death's clutches, makes the story one of exceptional worth. The beautiful backgrounds throughout the entire two thousand feet are from nature's choicest gardens, Ithaca, New York. The dramatic portrayal and the photography are excellent. Francis X. Bushman is very ably assisted by a capable cast.

"THE PHANTOM DUNGEON" (Union Features).

There is a pleasing story running through the Union Feature subject entitled the "Phantom Dungeon, or the Treasure of Baux," released October 31, which is portrayed with considerable melodramatic effect. Raymond de Beauxville having lost his fortune and, consequently, his intended, seeks death by suicide. But before taking the fatal step he sleeps and dreams of great treasure that has been deposited years ago by his ancestors in the ancient castle of the family. He awakes and sets out to discover the treasure. Passing through many adventures, he finally secures it and with it a bride, who loves him for himself rather than his wealth. Upon returning to Paris he is visited by the father of his first intended, who has learned of his good fortune and wants to renew the engagement with his daughter, but he learns of the marriage and is introduced by Raymond to the real treasure of Baux—the bride.

"WHAT HER DIARY TOLD."

This "Flying A" release of November 6th, is commendable because of the exquisite taste in the selection of settings both exterior and interior. The photographic quality is excellent and the dramatization superb. The general trend of the story is perhaps somewhat conventional, but presents a novel turn in that the bride, who, married to her husband because of his wealth and social standing, when the latter learns this from an entry in the diary of the bride and leaving her a handsome income and all his property at the time of his death, before his departure, does not seek out her lover, but comes to a realization of her love for the man who makes such a noble sacrifice for her.

Upon the advice of her physician she seeks to regain her failing health in the mountains and there accidentally meets her husband, who has been injured in a premature explosion at a mine. A reconciliation follows as a natural sequence. The story is beautifully told and will be well received.

"OVER THE CLIFFS" (Eclair).

Will E. Sheerer does a character in a forthcoming Eclair production which will be a revelation to his admirers among photoplay fans throughout the country.

The picture in question is called "Over the Cliffs." It is a thrilling Western, and the famous Eclair character man plays the part of an Indian. His makeup and dress of the character is superb. So realistic is his acting that several people who witnessed the showing of this film were puzzled to know whether or not they were seeing an Indian or a white man portraying an Indian. Sheerer's physique and features adapt themselves admirably to this sort of a character and these, combined with his artistic ability and cleverness as a makeup man, produce a finished result which is startling in its naturalness.

ALL STAR TERRITORIAL SALES.

Harry R. Raver, president of the All Star Feature Corporation, has sold the C. A. Marshall Theater Circuit, Duluth, Minn., the state rights for Minnesota, Wisconsin, and North Dakota for all productions of the All Star during the next fourteen months. The contract covers twelve productions, beginning with "Arizona."

A. D. Flintom, president of the Kansas City Feature Film Company, has bought the rights for Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, and Oklahoma. This contract covers the same period and the same number of productions as the one with the Marshall Circuit.

"Arizona" and the next eleven All Star features will be handled in Michigan by the Casino Company, of Detroit.

The Modern Film Company, Newark, N. J., has purchased the rights for Northern New Jersey to "Arizona" and has contracted for the rights to this territory for the next twelve productions, the period of time covered being fourteen months.

SAILORS SEE "TARGETS OF FATE."

The officers and a number of the crew of the steamer "Kaiser Franz Joseph de Groose" were the guests of the Reliance Company at the Grand Opera House, New York, on Sunday evening when, by special arrangement with the theater management, the two-reel Reliance feature, "Targets of Fate," was part of the picture program.

A number of interesting scenes in the photoplay were made on the steamship "Kaiser Franz Joseph de Grosse," among others being the launching of the life boats, in which the officers and crew of the vessel took a prominent part. Edgar Lewis, who directed the staging of the picture, was so delighted with the courtesy shown him while on board the boat that Sunday night's entertainment was arranged as a slight token of his appreciation.

WORLD SERIES PICTURES SUCCESSFUL.

Edward M. Roskam, president of the Commercial Motion Picture Company, announces that the photographs of the World Series, or the American baseball derby, for which he had the exclusive motion picture rights, have turned out splendidly. The Universal Film Mfg. Co. has taken over whatever territory that was not previously contracted for.

The pictures are creating a sensation, as disputed plays were shown so vividly that the pictures have been a means of deciding many of the disputes. Although bad weather prevailed throughout the week, the company succeeded in getting wonderful pictures and stand on record as being the only moving picture manufacturing concern that has ever taken pictures consecutively for five days, and succeeded in showing them throughout New York and Philadelphia the same night of the game. Mr. Roskam has an option on the sole and exclusive privilege to take pictures of the Army and Navy football game to be played at the Polo Grounds in November.

ITALA STATE RIGHT SALES.

Arthur D. Gans, representing the National Film Exchange of Baltimore, has purchased the rights for "Unmasked" for Maryland, Delaware, District of Columbia and Virginia. The Sedeg Feature Film Co., of New York City, have purchased another copy of "Tigris" for Greater New York City and Northern New Jersey. Among the purchases of state rights on "The Gypsy's Kiss" are the Golden Gate Film Exchange, of San Francisco; Northwestern Feature Film Co., of Portland; Union Film Company, of Chicago; Big 4 Feature Film Co., of Dallas; Weiland Feature Film Co., of Pittsburg; Electric Theater Supply Co., of Philadelphia; Exclusive Features, Inc., of New York City, and Famous Players Film Co., of Boston. A. R. Thorne has also purchased the Alaskan rights to exhibit "The War Correspondents."

KLEINE'S "POMPEII" OPENS IN DENVER AND CHICAGO.

October 19th, George Kleine's "Last Days of Pompeii" opened at the Broadway Theater, Denver, and will open at "Ziegfeld's" in Chicago on the 26th. A large business and enthusiastic audiences marked its opening at the American Theater, Spokane, Washington, last week.

A NEW FEATURE BOOKING AGENCY.

Mr. William H. Irvine, who has been in the show business for thirty years, has opened a booking agency in the World's Tower Building. His son is associated with him in the new venture. Mr. Irvine makes a specialty of booking high class features. He has just opened a branch at 1304 Vine Street, Philadelphia.

The New York territory of the great Eclectic feature, "Les Miserables," has finally been sold and will be seen shortly at a theater in New York City. The exhibiting rights were purchased by the Gordon Olympia Company, of Boston, Mass., which is taking steps to make a great showing of the picture on a large scale. The Gordon-Olympia Company is a substantial and reputable concern and can be depended upon to handle the production in an adequate manner.

For six months the New York territory was open and, although there were many bids for it, rumor was current that it would never sell or that the Eclectic Company did not know how to sell it. But the Eclectic people knew that they had a big winner and were content to go on quietly about their business, knowing that when the bargain-hunters had given up their fruitless quest the right party would come along and pay the right price; all of which has come to pass. This sale disposes of all American territory except western Canada, Nebraska, Iowa, Texas, Minnesota, North and South Dakota. The New York rights sold for an enormous price, but "Les Miserables" is a bargain at any price.

CHANGE IN EXCLUSIVE SERVICE PROGRAM.

The General Film Company has announced the addition of two more reels to its Exclusive Service program.

The original idea was to furnish twelve reels a week, divided into three programs of one multiple and two singles every second day.

The first release of the Exclusive Service twelve-reel plan was made on October 13th, and proved an instantaneous success. Next week's Exclusive Service program will be made up of 14 reels, and it will be possible for any exhibitor whose business requires it, to secure a complete exclusive entertainment, without resorting to a single "filler."

The General Film Company has received, in addition to orders, many highly complimentary letters expressing the gratification of the exhibitor over the positive assurance that the Exclusive program is not being prepared at the expense of the regular program, which will continue to be made up of the highest quality films that the ten licensed manufacturers are able to produce. Many letters have been received which express satisfaction with the statement made last week that Exclusive Service would not be furnished in any locality where its use might work a hardship on the exhibitor who is already using licensed service.

Simplex Projector

COLUMBIA University of New York City is the largest in the world in point of attendance. In scientific matters, it has no superior.

The heads of the scientific departments who will use the Simplex projector, each has an international reputation and is recognized as the final authority in their own particular field of research.

The fact that this learned body of scientists selected the Simplex projector for their work is conclusive proof that it is scientifically correct and mechanically perfect.

No greater compliment can be paid to any machine than the endorsement of such an Institution.

It should be of great encouragement to the trade that the price of the Simplex projector places it within reach of the small exhibitor as well as the large one, thus making it possible for all live up-to-date exhibitors to give their patrons perfect projection by means of a machine which is built to wear.

EDISON.

WILD WALES—(Nov. 3).—Perhaps the most interesting single feature of the film is the Abbey of Valle Crucis at Llangollen, England, built in 1200 A. D. by Cistercian Monks from France, it is today a remarkably well preserved specimen of the later Norman architecture. Magnificent pictures of the romantic Welsh mountain scenery are shown. A sparkling, rocky little brook is introduced to us as the source of the famous River Dee. Further down, at Llangollen, we catch a glimpse of a salmon fisherman seated in an odd little tub-like craft, known as a "coracle." Bettws-y-Coed is a curious sort of waterfall, not unlike a great bunch of flowers in appearance.

Several remarkable bridges, one of which was built by the Romans, and a charming view of Dolwyddelan castle, are other featcres of this picture. The film closes with a close view of a certain Jenny Jones, a typical old Welshwoman, clad in the conventional garb of the country.

PORGY'S BOUQUET (Nov. 3).—In the classic literature of childhood, we read of a certain Georgy Porgy, who kissed the girls and made them cry. From the time of his early misadventures, Georgy Porgy continued running away from the girls until he reached the age of fifty. At this dangerous period, he fell madly in love with an attractive spinster. One day, while walking downtown with his lady-love, Georgy stopped at a florist's and purchased a magnificent bouquet of flowers. After he had taken the lady home and returned to his own apartment, he discovered that he had absentmindedly forgotten to give her the flowers. Accordingly he immediately sent for a messenger boy, and waving to his inamorata in the opposite window, showed her the flowers, and indicated what he intended to do with them.

The Smiths lived in the apartment beneath Georgy's friend. Mrs. Smith, sitting at the window, was highly annoyed when she discovered a strange man apparently trying to flirt with her from the opposite window. She had just received a letter from her father telling her that he intended to make her husband a partner of the firm on the anniversary of their wedding, a week later. Mr. Smith, annoyed by his wife's reticence about the letter, tried to take it from her. The letter tore and Mr. Smith got a piece, which read, "Don't let him suspect this. Your loving papa." Immediately thereafter Mr. Smith discovered the man at the window opposite, and jumped at the conclusion that he had sent the note. When the messenger boy brought the flowers to the Smith's apartment by mistake, it capped the climax. The tensity of the situation was increased when Georgy came over to hunt for the flowers, which had not reached their proper destination.

TOMMY'S STRATAGEM (Nov. 4).—When Tommy's mother died, it seemed to him that the world had grown very dark indeed. At the tender age of nine he found himself obliged to earn his own living by sewing. He tolerated it as long as he could, and then ran away. He left a noisy, dirty city behind him, and went like a homing bird, to the green trees and pleasant fields which are the heritage of little children.

Mr. and Mrs. Van Alsten were not very happy. After five years of married life they had slowly drifted apart. Freddy Ralston, a young man with a none too enviable reputation, came to the house a great deal more often than Mr. Van Alsten liked, and Mrs. Van Alsten seemed to care more for the society of the young man than for that of her husband.

In the course of his wanderings, Tommy, tired and hungry, happened upon the Van Alsten estate. Buried in the pillows of a couch in the Van Alsten boathouse, he watched Freddy Ralston languidly rescue Mrs. Van Alsten's pet dog from the lake. The anxious care bestowed upon the wet and dripping dog, gave Tommy an idea. Perhaps if he fell into the water they would be nice to him too. Accordingly, Tommy fell into the water. He knew how to swim, but if he hadn't he might well have drowned, for Ralston made no move to aid him, nothing was done until Mr. Van Alsten, appearing suddenly on the scene, plunged into the water and pulled him out.

After he was dried and fed, Mrs. Van Alsten, who had gained a new appreciation of her husband's character in the light of his actions as compared with those of Ralston, announced to Tommy that he might stay in their house always. Tommy, overcome with delight, was also afflicted with remorse. He told the Van Alstens that he had fallen in on purpose in every expectation that they would incontinently send him away. But they didn't.

ARCHIE AND THE BELLBOY (Nov. 5).—It is not altogether Archie's fault that he was a "mollycoddle." From earliest childhood they had carefully shielded Archie from contact with rude boys who did not keep their hands and faces clean. At he was twelve, and they didn't allow him to go out on the street without his nurse.

One day, Archie left his nurse in the park and attempted to play ball with some boys. The boys didn't do a thing to Archie. They blackened his eye, punched his nose and finally, when the nurse rescued him, the entire crowd were sitting on Archie, pounding him with hands and feet.

Archie, howling bitterly, was led back to the hotel in which his family lived. His pitiful case did not excite much sympathy from his only friend, Bobs, the bell-boy. Bobs was considerably smaller than Archie, but he was a natural born "scrapper." Bobs promised to teach Archie how to fight. At every spare opportunity, they would slip off to the drummers' sample room, where Bobs would initiate Archie in the mysteries of undercut and uppercut. Bobs was hardly a scientific boxer, and he occasionally, in the heat of conflict, forgot that he was only a teacher, and "let into" Archie with all his might—all of which was a very good thing for Archie.

His parents noticed the improvement in Archie and ascribed it to a tonic which had lately been prescribed for their darling by a fashionable physician.

One day, Archie went out to the park, met the same boys, and thoroughly turned the tables on them. He returned to the hotel swaggering, carrying with him the ball he had captured from his foes. He informed his parents that he was done with nurses and that he intended to run away and become a pirate. Archie didn't become a pirate, but he did become a fine, manly boy, which is much better than being a mollycoddle.

A FACE FROM THE PAST (Special—2 parts—Nov. 7).—When Edward Pendleton drove through the little village of Rosedale, in the late nineties, he passed a girl of extraordinary beauty, with whom he promptly fell in love. Instead of passing through Rosedale, as he had at first intended, he stopped at the little inn there, formed an acquaintance with the girl, Margaret Brown, won her love, married her and took her away to the city. John Forbes, a very young farmer, had worshipped Margaret with all the intensity of a boy's devotion. When Pendleton took her away, Forbes received the greatest hurt of his life. Bitterly angry, he swore to be revenged on the man who had taken away the only girl he could ever possibly care for, and devoted the remainder of his life to the accomplishment of his vindictive purpose.

Sixteen years later, John Forbes had risen from a mere farmhand to the position of one of the most powerful financiers in the great city. He had never lost sight of his hatred for Pendleton during all these years, and finally, after months of cautious planning, he was able to sweep Pendleton's fortune entirely away from him by one decisive stroke. Pendleton, ruined and desperate, called on Forbes and implored him to be lenient. Forbes refused curtly and Pendleton, buying an interest in a western mining claim with the few hundreds that were left, went West with his fifteen-year-old daughter.

Two years later, Forbes, making a tour of inspection of his railroad property, was held up by track repairs, left the train and fell down the side of a canyon. Margaret Pendleton, riding down the bottom of the canyon, came upon the mysteriously injured man and carried him back to her home. Forbes, wounded and delirious, thought the girl was his old love, Margaret Brown, and surprised her by calling her "Margaret." The meeting between Pendleton and the man who had ruined him was fraught with some emotion. But Forbes was helpless and Pendleton could do nothing else but care for him. Forbes recovering, was newly struck by the remarkable resemblance between Margaret and her mother. He became ashamed of the part he had played and promised Pendleton to restore the fortune he had wrested from him. When he was entirely well he fulfilled his promise.

Forbes was still, to all intents a young man, and Margaret a peculiarly beautiful girl. We leave them with a full assurance that the romance, so unfortunately shattered years before, is now at length to be happily continued.

ELISE, THE FORESTER'S DAUGHTER (Nov. 8).—Elise's father was a guide in the great forests of lower Canada. Jean, the fiddler, loved her. Jean made his violin sing strange, wonderful things about the stars and the moon and the birth of dawn. When Elise was in proper mood, Jean's playing made her dream of sweet, desirable things, but when one of her bursts of perverse gaiety came upon her, she laughed at Jean and mocked him, hurting him far more than she realized.

And then Jack Hartopp came up from the city with his sister for the fall shooting. To Elise, Hartopp was a being of another world, a cultivated, superior being, godlike in contrast with the only person she knew. One day when her father was absent, Elise offered to guide Hartopp into the woods for the afternoon's shooting. Jean saw them going off together, and followed sadly, without exactly knowing why he did so. As it happened, Hartopp firing at a low-flying woodcock, sent a charge of shot into Jean's arm. Jean, dazed with pain, crept off, like a wounded animal, without letting them know he had been hit. He crawled as far as the road and fainted.

Clara Hartopp, driving by in her machine, found Jean lying in the road and raced with him to the doctor. After that she took him to his home. Jean's wistful face and gentle manner touched the society woman, and she was very kind to the boy. When she left she gave him a flower, which Jean, deeply moved by her sympathy, pressed to his lips. Elise came upon him at this moment and in a passion of love and jealousy, took the flower from Jean's hand and tore it to bits. Then she knelt beside him and sobbingly told him how very sorry she was for the way she had treated him.

KALEM.

THE HIGH-BORN CHILD AND THE BEGGAR (Oct. 27).—A bronze gate guards the entrance to the grounds surrounding the home of the high-born child. The little beggar maid peering wistfully through the bars, sees him, a hopeless cripple, sitting in his chair. Thus their friendship commences.

As time goes on, the high-born child gives the beggar maid many of his toys. But of all his gifts, she prizes most a little white flower.

A servant notices the intimacy between the two. She drives the beggar maid away. Because he is deprived of her cheery friendship, the high-born child pines away. The beggar maid learns he is ill. She creeps under the bronze gate and goes toward the house. As she mounts the steps, the doctor comes from the house and tells her the little cripple has just died.

The beggar maid is hungry, weary and ill. She wanders toward the riverside and lies down to rest by the side of the stream. Then comes a dream. The high-born child beckons to her—she follows—

Late that night, a policeman making his rounds finds a little form, clasping a withered flower, lying by the river side.

SPORTS IN MERRY ENGLAND (Oct. 27).—Among the interesting scenes shown in this feature is an otter hunt, with a pack of hounds swimming down a stream in full pursuit. Another feature is a view of the famous classic of the English turf, the Goodwood Races.

THE SPEED LIMIT (Oct. 31).—Jim wishes to make an impression upon Jane, his sweetheart. He calls upon her in a taxi, which he forgets to dismiss when he enters the house.

Judge Holden, Jane's father, dislikes Jim and leaves the house when the boy calls. Later, when Jim leaves he faces a taxi bill he cannot pay. He is arrested and taken before Judge Holden. Jane calls to see her father and arrives while Jim is being tried.

Jim is fined. Jane saves him from jail by slipping him the money with which to pay his fine. The chauffeur and the judge dive for the money. Holden gets it and pockets it, after which he discharges Jim.

Jim is elected town marshal. He elopes with Jane. Judge Holden pursues the pair. Jim allows him to catch up and then arrests him for speeding. He places handcuffs on the Judge and has him arraigned in his own court. A substitute judge fines Holden.

The humor of the situation appeals to Judge Holden. As Jim and Jane are leaving the court, he calls them back. Surprised, the two return. Turning to the substitute judge, Holden laughingly orders him to perform the marriage ceremony.

THE GRANITE INDUSTRY (Oct. 31).—This feature shows the operation of the largest granite quarry in the world. Every detail, from the hewing of the stone from the face of the mountain to the polishing of the finished product, is shown. A picture that is highly interesting and educational.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPECIAL (Nov. 1).—Billy is driven from home because of his intemperate habits. His sister pleads with him to start life anew. Billy goes to a distant part of his father's road and secures a position as fireman.

Billy and his engineer, Trent, become firm friends. The boy makes his home with the Trents and falls in love with Ruth, the daughter. They marry. Three years later, Billy is promoted and given his own engine.

The new engineer accidentally incurs the hatred of an engine wiper. The latter places sand in the journals of the engine and then plants a flask of whiskey in Billy's locker. The sanded journals cause a tie-up of the line. An inspector finds the bottle of whiskey in the locker and Billy is suspended.

President Wayne has tried in vain to find his son. The man leaves on a tour of inspection. When he arrives at Billy's division, Wayne receives a message telling him his daughter is seriously ill. A special is hastily made up. A shortage of men results in Billy's assignment to the engine.

As the boy reaches the roundhouse to take his locomotive out, a steam valve bursts and mortally scalds the wiper. Billy rescues the man and is himself burned, but pluckily insists upon resuming duty. The wiper, dying, confesses he planted the bottle in Billy's locker.

The boy takes the Special through on fast time. Wayne comes forward to say a word of appreciation and finds the engineer is his own son. News of his son's heroic conduct reaches Wayne and Billy once more comes to his own.

FOR MEN ONLY

YES, only for men and women of red blood, with love for a good fight, clever plotting, quick thinking and quicker acting is this state rights feature intended.

In the same degree that this advertisement caught your attention will the film and its "paper" rivet your exhibitors' attention by its clean, honest worth.

VITAGRAPH.

THE KING'S MAN (Nov. 3).—Babette, the daughter of old Jules, a whiskey runner, lives with her father in a picturesque lodge in the Canadian Northwest. Jules starts out through the wilderness. Babette is not long alone for Blake, the King's man, of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, who loves her, comes to see her. She is sorry when he goes. He has given her his picture and she is admiring it when Pierre, a surly, ignorant Canadian half breed, who also loves Babette, comes in. He snatches the picture and throws it into the log fire. He threatens to expose her father's illegitimate business. Then he leaves her.

Old Jules comes back and Babette tells of Pierre's threat. Jules, infuriated, rushes out. The two men meet far in the woods and fight with hunting knives. Jules is left lying upon the ground, mortally wounded. But back in the cabin, Blake has called again on Babette and has heard all. He hastens to find and to help Jules. Following his tracks, he locates him. He throws him over his saddle and takes him home. Then he goes in search of Pierre.

Pierre is possessed with delirious fear, imagining that the ghost of Jules follows him. He wanders aimlessly about, no longer knowing where he is. He comes to Jule's cabin. He sees Blake mounting his horse. He bides until Blake goes, then enters the cabin, where the old man is lying on the bunk, dying. The girl orders her tormentor to go. Pierre laughs cruelly and grips her by the wrists. He says she must follow him to the wilderness. She is struggling when Blake returns. The two men grapple. Pierre draws his knife and holds it above the soldier, whom he forces back on the table. Her father, too weak to raise himself, makes repeated attempts to get his big revolver from the holster on the wall, eventually succeeding; but he has not the strength to cock it. While he tries over and over again to do so the knife is getting closer to Blake. Finally, with a mighty effort, Jules cocks the revolver and fires. Pierre falls back dead. Jules, dying, places Babette's hand in Blake's and gives them his blessing.

THE SILVER BACHELORHOOD (Nov. 4).—Many years have elapsed since George Carston, a bachelor now almost fifty years of age, last saw Grace Dare, the girl he loved while at college. In startlingly vivid visions, he recalls the days of his association with Grace. The one episode which stands out above all others is that in which Billy, his classmate, tries to make love to her out on the tennis court, and he interferes, only to be repulsed by Grace, who afterwards tearfully regrets having acted as she did as it ended their friendship. When he comes to from his visions, Carston writes to Grace.

Grace receives his note while playing cards in her drawing-room at her fashionable hotel. She is no longer the same sweet type of womanhood that she was at college. Her face has become hardened by fast living. Sitting with her at the card table is Billy. After hesitating, she answers Carston's letter.

Later, accompanied by Billy, she goes to Carston's home. She enters the house alone, leaving Billy to wait outside. She finds Carston in his den, asleep, she thinks, but in reality, dead. When she looks at the picture of herself upon his table, comparing it with herself in the mirror, and realizes for the first time what a hideous change has been wrought in her appearance, she shudders and goes into a frenzy of despair. Not having the courage to face her former sweetheart, she steals out of the den and returns to her home, going straight to her room. There she picks up a dagger and stares at it dazedly as though it fascinated her. Then she plunges it into her bosom and falls backward on the table, dead.

THE HOODOO UMBRELLA (Nov. 5).—After the destruction of her old umbrella, Mrs. Smith purchases a new one of the latest design with a patent spring which opens and shuts it by a slight pressure at the handle. It insists upon opening unexpectedly at the most inopportune moments, frightening herself and others almost into a collapse. On the street it startles passersby by suddenly opening itself in their faces. She attends a bargain and while in the midst of the rush, it springs open, almost creating a panic. It does the same thing when she enters a trolley car, causing no end of laughter and not a little commotion. She is hurriedly ejected from the conveyance with a parting salutation of "good riddance to bad rubbish." Hurrying home, her husband greets her with much peevishness, which is greatly increased when her new umbrella unceremoniously opens with a startling bang and repeats its performance until he becomes exceedingly nervous. Mr. and Mrs. Smith are seated at the table when the maid enters with a tray of dishes. She accidentally touches the spring of the umbrella standing at Mrs. Smith's side; it opens so quickly the maid drops the dishes in alarm. Mr. Smith determines that his wife shall get rid of the umbrella and she has the same disposition herself. He purchases her a complete outfit of raincoat and rubber cap, which he presents to her with the promise that she will dispense with the umbrella. She agrees and together they go to the Brooklyn Bridge and throw the incorrigible rain-shedder from the bridge. It lands in a passing tugboat. The mate of the tug picks it up, greatly frightened when it insists upon springing open without warning. He ties a hawser around it and seeing the name of Mrs. Smith on the handle, he recalls her as an old friend and returns it, much to the amazement of Mr. and Mrs. Smith. They come to the conclusion that it is a hoodoo. Mr. Smith rushes out into the yard and smashes it with an axe. Together they carry it far from their home and dispose of it in the gutter, where it is no longer a menace to their peace and happiness.

A BROKEN MELODY (Nov. 6).—In a cozy little cottage lives Arnold Bennett, now grown old and feeble and his daughter, Margaret. They are in the parlor of the home one evening at sunset, he playing a melody softly upon the harpsichord, and she standing by his side singing. There comes a rough, heavy bearded tramp, who is admitted into the house and given food. And while he eats he hears the sweet music and goes toward it. Suddenly his eyes fall upon the picture of a brown-eyed girl, it is not Margaret, it is her mother. He walks to the old man and shakes his fists in his face, and says, "You stole her from me twenty years ago. I swore then that you should suffer." Then the tramp leaves and the old man, full of anguish totters over to the picture and holds a vase of roses before it. He sits down and sees a vision of his wife.

Judson Blair, of the Secret Service, has seen the girl. Soon afterward he meets her and her father out walking. The old man is taken ill, necessitating Blair's assistance to get him home. And so their friendship and their love grows. But the tramp has made good his threat and a letter comes to Blair to arrest Bennett, wanted on an old charge of embezzlement. After a terrible mental struggle Blair resigns his position and returns the warrant. He goes to Margaret's house and meets her again, listening to the soft music of a melody from within. The melody abruptly ceases and the young couple hasten in doors to find the aged player dead on an armchair.

FLAMING HEARTS (Nov. 7).—Madeline Winters, quite stout, coy, and sentimental, is breathless with sympathetic excitement as she finishes for the fourth time the last page of "Flaming Hearts." Nothing will suit her now but that she must write the author for his photograph. Jonathan Whippletree, very portly, and naively proud of his accomplishments, is a man who smiles warmly under the caress of compliments. His vanity is greatly satisfied by words of praise, especially from a woman, so he sends Madeline his photograph. Jonathan Whippletree is more than pleased when he receives another scented note from his sweet admirer, thanking him for the photograph and begging him to call, also enclosing in another envelope a picture of herself. When this arrives it is Mr. Whippletree who is pleased, not his very rotund secretary, Mr. William Wiffles. For William falls desperately in love with Madeline the minute he lays eyes upon her photograph.

The favored author makes himself as handsome as he can in his evening clothes and goes to see Miss Madeline Winters. But though she gives him every opportunity to express his feelings, his bashfulness prevents him from doing so. Excusing himself he hastens to a nearby saloon to get up nerve. He has no trouble doing so, as he is not a drinking man and needs little stimulant to get the desired result. But William will not be outdone. At a wig and make-up shop he buys what will enable him to look like his hated rival and goes to Madeline's house in his new disguise. He makes a great hit with the lady by being anything but bashful, and when the vain author returns Madeline has become so fond of him that even when she learns of his ruse she will not give him up. Jonathan Whippletree tries to kill himself with a razor, a pistol and a bottle of poison, but finally ends his evening by solacing himself at a nearby saloon.

THE DIVER (Special—2 parts—Nov. 8).—Margaret Brachen and her guest Rita Malrose, a handsome young widow, are extremely jealous of Mlle. Vivian, the Diver, whom Rupert Brachen, Margaret's husband, and John Hawley, see performing at the Hippodrome. They are indignant when the two men invite the charming diver to perform at a lawn fete which Margaret has gotten up at their country place at Travis Sound. But Rita gets an opportunity to make Hawley suspicious and she puts her plans into execution. Some flowers are sent to Margaret by her husband for a sick friend, but arrive after Margaret has started to the friend's house. Rita sends them to Vivian unidentified, and bribes the messenger boy to drop a handkerchief marked with Brachen's initials in Vivian's room. When Hawley sees the flowers and the handkerchief his suspicions are fully aroused. Rita sends a note to him saying that if he would know Vivian's true character, to watch her house at midnight. She dresses up in some evening clothes belonging to Brachen, who is away, and when Hawley comes to Vivian's house, walks down the front steps in full view, returning then to the Brachen home, thus confirming his worst suspicions.

The Brachens and their guest Rita stop at Niagara Falls before returning to the city. One day little Agatha, Vivian's daughter, wanders away and gets into a boat which some boys are playing with by the river. The boat slips from the grasp of one of the boys and is carried into the swift current toward Niagara Falls. Vivian, in Niagara to open her season there, while standing on a cliff above the falls sees the child coming down the river. She throws off her pumps and dives into the water. She has a tremendous struggle fighting the current, and only by supreme effort succeeds in getting the boat before it goes over the falls, and taking the child from it to the shore, where she falls in a dead faint and is taken to the Bracken cottage to be given medical attention. Rita, repentant, wires for Hawley, and tells him of her duplicity. Hawley rushes in to Vivian, to be reunited with the girl he thought has been false to him.

LUBIN.

THE DOUBLE CHASE (Nov. 3).—Mrs. Bland, a rich woman, occupies a beautiful home with her son Allen, a boy of seventeen, and her adopted daughter, Madge, fourteen. One day, Madge, through carelessness, is the cause of a delay in Allen's fishing trip. He berates her while she begs to accompany him. He refuses, but she follows, only to cause more trouble by falling into the stream just as he gets a nibble.

Allen, disgusted, leaves Madge to climb up the bank alone. When he reaches home he finds his mother and his boyhood sweetheart, Ruth, waiting for him. His mother has received news that he has passed his examination for college. Madge comes home and tries to tell Allen that she is sorry. He pays no attention to her and goes off.

Allen leaves home; his mother parts with him sorrowfully and Madge is heartbroken. Two years pass and Mrs. Bland decides to send Madge to a young ladies' seminary to finish her education. During Allen's absence he has corresponded with Ruth and Madge. To Ruth he writes glowing accounts of his achievements, his plans for the future, etc., while to Madge he writes patronizing letters full of wise counsel, as though she were a child. Meanwhile Madge in her new environment, is fast developing into a beautiful, refined young woman and resents his lofty manner. It is after the receipt of one of those superior sounding letters that Madge rebels and vows she will write no more.

Two years more pass. Madge, a charming young lady, is at home on her vacation. Allen has completed his college course and is expected home. Allen is surprised and disappointed in Ruth; he finds her a silly country girl, awkward and uninteresting. Madge comes into the room, pretending not to see him. Allen is taken by surprise and calls to his mother to know who she is. Upon being told it is Madge, he starts after her, and the second chase begins. He, in turn, is chased by Ruth. After many laughable situations, during which time Allen falls in love with Madge, he follows her everywhere. He at last follows her to the summer house, where he tries to tell her of his love. The last scene shows Madge in Allen's arms.

MAGIC MELODY (Nov. 4).—Charles Lennox, an American physician, his wife, Clara Lennox, and little daughter, Mildred, settle in a remote section of Mexico to develop a mining claim. He still retains his physician's sign, but does very little medical work. Mrs. Lennox is an accomplished violinist. Tomas, an ignorant, savage mountain peon, who lives with his mother and sister, Carita, in a hut in the mountains, has not heard of the doctor in the valley. The peon's mother falls ill. Carita, in passing the doctor's house, sees the sign on the door and returning to the hut, tells Tomas of the white physician. Tomas goes to Lennox's house and there hears Clara playing her violin. The peon, who never heard anything of the kind before, is entranced by the music. Dr. Lennox goes to Tomas' hut, examines the mother and leaves a bottle of medicine and spoon, with instructions that the peon shall give the patient a dose of one spoonful. The doctor gone, Tomas, in his ignorance, throws the spoon away and makes his mother drink the entire bottle of medicine at one time. The dose is too much and next morning finds Tomas' mother dead. The peon blames the doctor and under his belief of "a life for a life," swears vengeance.

That morning Lennox goes to the mine as usual, while Mrs. Lennox departs on an errand, leaving baby Mildred locked in the house. The child climbs out the side window and goes off up the mountain, where she meets Tomas and Carita. The coming of the child suggests a plan to the peons. Tomas takes baby Mildred to the ancient sacrificial altar of the sun god on the mountain trail. Carita hurries to the doctor's house and pins a note on the door, which states that unless the doctor goes to the sun god altar before sunset and give his life for the mother, baby Mildred will be sacrificed. Mrs. Lennox returns about fifteen minutes before sundown and finds the note. Distracted and without firearms Mrs. Lennox hits on the idea of using her violin to distract Tomas and save baby Mildred. Leaving a note on the door sounding danger Mrs. Lennox rings the bell, which summons Lennox from the mine, and mounting her horse gallops for the mountain altar. There she finds Tomas just about to kill baby Mildred and holds him off hypnotized by playing her violin. Later, Lennox and three rurals he met on the road arrive in time to relieve the exhausted wife and save the child. Tomas is arrested.

THE PRICE OF VICTORY (Special—2 parts—Nov. 6).—Colonel Robert Carey, a young southerner, and Lorena Gray, his sweetheart, have a lovers' quarrel and before they could make up he is ordered to the front. Foolish pride keeps the lovers silent and a year passes. Carey is on the staff of General Jackson, and has become famed for his reckless courage. Lorena, ardent for the Southern cause, and seeking forgetfulness of her unhappy love affair, has entered the Confederate secret service, and is ordered to report to General Jackson. As she approaches Jackson's headquarters, the sound of a cannon tells her that a fierce battle is in progress. Jackson has ordered the destruction of a bridge over Cold Creek. The Union general at the same time orders a brigade to cross this bridge and attack Jackson. The Confederates succeed in mining the bridge, but are driven off before they can explode their mine. Carey volunteers to swim down the stream, the only possible method of approach, and explode the mine, though this will entail his certain death. In making the attempt he is badly wounded by a sharpshooter and cannot proceed. He is found by Lorena and a joyous reconciliation takes place. Carey, however, soon remembers his mission, the failure of which will mean a crushing defeat to the South, but he is helpless by reason of his wound. Lorena proposes to go in his stead, and though he knows he is sending her to certain death, he gives to his cause far more than his own life, and bids her go. Lorena reaches the mine under the bridge piers as the Union brigade is pouring across and fires into the loose powder with the revolver Carey has given her. Her life is the price she pays for the victory. Through the bloody years that follow, Carey is ever in the forefront of the battle, but the swift death for which he longs passes him by. After the war Carey lives on through the lonely, weary years. At last, half a century after the day on which his real life ended, he makes his way to the grave of his girlish sweetheart, and falls asleep, to find the weary waiting done.

COCOANUT INDUSTRY (Nov. 7).—This picture is taken in Central America, and gives beautiful scenes of the groves, or jungles, where the tree flourishes. The cocoanut tree is not unlike the palm tree, with a bamboo stem, which the gatherers walk up with monkey-like rapidity. The big nuts are thrown to the ground to other negroes, who proceed to cut off the husks and throw the nuts in the mule wagons for shipment. The negroes who gather are inordinately fond of cocoanut milk, and freely take advantage of a broken nut to enjoy a beverage.

GETTING THE BEST OF DAD (Nov. 7).—Papa Jonathan Jones and son John are alone in the world with their wealth. Father goes off on a hunting trip to his up-state lodge, and John pays attention to his sweetheart, Jennie Roach, a struggling young stenographer. They become engaged and John writes his father that he has become engaged to a sweet young working girl and would expect blessings by return mail. Father gets the letter and writes back that he will accept no working girl as the head of his household to take the place of his son's mother, and that if he marries without his consent he will disown him. That puts a new complexion on the matter and the two decide to wait. Father returns and listens to his son's plea. He tells John that he won't see the girl and won't let him marry her. John and Jennie wonder what to do. Father advertises for a stenographer and Jennie gives up her job and gets the one with Papa Jones. Jonathan takes a great liking to Jennie, which soon ripens into love, and he decides to ask her hand in marriage. He, however,

THE CHAMPION OF THE Motion Picture WORLD

The above is a good likeness of the new heavy-weight champion of the (Motion Picture) world, taken at the Ince & Sennett training camp in the Santa Monica Canyon, near Los Angeles, California. The young champion (for young he certainly is, having been in the game a little over a year) hails from New York town. He comes from the well-known Knickerbocker family (Kessel & Baumann).

His people, noting his early inclinations and apt fitness to fill this field of endeavor, were not averse—in fact, even urged him on, and placed him in the hands of Thomas H. Ince and Mack Sennett, under whose able tutelage he soon rounded into championship form.

Sennett, as his trainer, specialized on head work, and soon cultivated in him a habit of thinking fast and how to take a punch on the jaw (Keystone) and go with it so that it would lose its effect. The last is rather difficult for a trainer to drill into a youngster of this type, as they like to take it on the jaw to show "they are there," and invariably they take one too many and go down in defeat.

While Sennett was developing his dome (Keystone), Ince was busy on his body (Domino) and hands (Broncho and Kay-Bee), and soon had bulging muscles all over his body. The ones sheathing his stomach, resembling a washboard, on which he could take any kind of a punch with a smile; and as a two-handed fighter there never was one better. He can hit equally well from either side, and his assortment of blows are much too complex to dwell upon, but it is his fast left-hand jab and hook (Broncho), or straight right or jolt (Kay-Bee), that usually brings home the bacon. The champ's climb to the top has been comparatively easy, as none of the so-called contendors for the title have been able to stay a round with him.

It is safe to assume, with the watchful eyes of Tom Ince and Mack Sennett on him, he will be a champion for some time to come.

loses his nerve and writes her a note asking her to become the head of his household, etc Jennie laughs at her victory and sends for John. Then she answers that she would be delighted to take the place of head of his household. Johnathan begins to primp up and fix himself in gallant shape to do the rest. Meanwhile, John arrives at the office, the clerks have gone. He puts the engagement ring back on Jennie's finger and has his arm about her as father emerges from the inner office. Father is startled and starts to make a fuss about his son daring to take such privileges so soon, but John tells his father that he is a bit late, and shows his own desire on paper to have Jennie the head of his household. That invalidates his refusal of some time back for the same reason, and father begins to see light. Then, being a good sport, he gives them his blessing.

HIAWANDA'S CROSS (Nov. 8).—Long ago, Hiawanda came across a missionary in the hills of New Mexico. She sees a cross lying upon the Bible, the missionary having fallen asleep while reading. She notices the ribbon attached to the cross and takes it. Later, Gray Eagle, her Indian lover, notices the cross and recognizes the connection between the cross and the maid and suspects Hiawanda, his sweetheart. He swears vengeance. Hiawanda runs to the missionary and warns him. The maid starts for her companions and in returning, hears a rolling stone, which attracts her attention to her Indian lover on the trail of the white man. She turns to warn the white man, but too late. The Indian's arrow stands true and the missionary falls on his face in the water, shot in the back. Hiawanda gives him succor, removes the arrow from his back and nurses him back to life. The missionary, in return, teaches her the alphabet. Later a call from the East comes and the missionary determines to answer it as per his orders at once. Not suspecting that Hiawanda's love has grown to the extent it has, he is hurt and pained, but leaves her. But her heart goes to the East with him. She, in sorrow, with a broken heart, turns back to her people, who spurn her because of the cross she wears, which represents the white man. She is driven from her home, and taking the cross in her hands, she goes into a boat of boughs and drifts toward a great falls, and we leave her as we found her, in darkness.

SELIG.

THE SCHOOLMARM'S SHOOTING MATCH (Nov. 7).—When a pretty school teacher comes to the settlement to teach the young ideas how to shoot, where the older ones have been doing it with such deadly accuracy that the graveyard is almost as well tenanted as the town, it causes some sensation. Pretty women, brainy beauties and marriagable opportunities are so rare in the thinly populated wild western districts, that a candidate having the two former attributes, is sure to arouse admiration that will bring about conflicts of rivals. When dainty Mollie puts her foot over the threshold of the schoolroom, the entire board of school trustees conspire to propose to her. While they are united in this determination, they are generous enough to individualize and allow her the privilege of choosing between them. She has a sense of humor, cleverness and sentiments all her own, and her sweetheart, Bill Swift, has outdistanced all rivals without their knowing it. She puts up a job with him on them and arranges a shooting match, the best marksman to be the winner. Bill supplies her with blank cartridges, so that the only sensation registered by the shooting upon the trustees is the recoil of their guns upon their own shoulders. They are but slightly sore over the results—honors being even—but are real hurt when Bill tells them that he is the real one and has arranged to marry Mollie. They are still doubtful, and follow the pair to the preacher's house and witness the ceremony through the window. At the conclusion they "shoot up" the air in disgust and disappointment and retire to their shacks, vowing to continue their bachelorhood.

THE CONVERSION OF MR. ANTI (Nov. 6).—Mr. Anti is one of those strange personages of cross purpose disposition, who is against everything. The salesmen who are pushing his own business can hardly get to explain to him before he turns them down. Upon his way home he meets a minister, who speaks to him and produces a charitable subscription paper, which Mr. Anti glares at and thrusts back at him in disconcerting fashion. He is accosted by a beggar, and stops long enough to deliver him a lecture, but no money. He meets a newsboy with papers, borrows one long enough to read the headlines, and hands it back to the boy without reimbursing him. He steps between a couple of men smoking cigarettes and addresses them reprovingly. They are about to resent his suggestions, when he makes a run for a car; then they laugh at him as a crank. Of course, he has his troubles on the street car, being obliged to stand up, which fact he blames on the conductor, who finally plunks him into a vacant seat. When he reaches home he finds his daughter and her sweetheart waiting to get his answer in a very important matter; but he turns them down and paces up and down his room in high dudgeon. The lover is undiscouraged and arranges to elope with the daughter. The daughter later advises her father of this fact by telegram, asking him to come to the minister's house at once, as something important is going to happen. Mr. Anti has his curiosity piqued and his temper aroused in an equal measure, and follows the directions in the telegram. He arrives a little bit too late, as his daughter is married. He roars frantically and disinherits her.

Seven years elapse and Anti is still storming at everything. One day he is driving his auto through the streets, when he runs over his own granddaughter, little Laura. She is not seriously injured, so he gets out and lectures her. In a hysterical sort of way she throws her arms around his neck, and he cannot disengage her; strangely enough, he tries to pacify her. The long forgotten touch of the little child seems to work an instantaneous change in the nature of the flinty-hearted man. He goes to the playground with little Laura, enters their games, and soon grows quite wholesomely human. He gives a liberal check for other playgrounds. Eventually the little child brings him to her own home; he recognizes the mother he has disinherited, and all ends well.

THE PROBATIONER (Nov. 5).—Freckles, a bright, cheery lad, lives with his dear old Granny. They are very poor, and—sometimes they go hungry. One day, when hunger gripped him, he "swiped" a loaf of bread from the baker's wagon. The baker saw him, caught him and then with undue severity, boxed his ears and hauled him off to the Juvenile Court. Judge Hendricks was so favorably impressed with the lad's appearance that he released him on "probation" and then gave him some money to start him right. Freckles rushes home to tell Granny. In the interim that poor old woman has found a $5.00 bill, which gives her much joy. She conceals it for the time. Later in the week, when Freckles reports to the judge, as he has been ordered to do, that functionary gives him a note requesting his wife to give him a suit of their son's old clothes. While he is waiting in the room the maid of the judge's wife comes back from the store and leaves a new $5.00 bill on a table near the window. The boy does not see the money and it blows through the window. After his departure, the maid, who cannot find the money, suspects Freckles. They telephone the judge and he sends a probation officer after the boy. He has gone to the store to make purchases with the new $5.00 bill that his Granny had found. The officer follows him and without waiting for explanations, hails the boy into court. Fortunately, the judge's little daughter picks up the bill that had blown from the window into their back yard. She phones the court and Freckles is exonerated in the nick of time.

SLIPPING FINGERS (Nov. 4).—Betty was a beauty, the idol of her family and numerous outsiders. Betty's sister, Gertrude, a thoughtless beauty, returns home from school, and Warren, the fiancé of Betty, forgetting all of her virtues, falls in love at sight with the younger sister. So Betty finds that her grasp on Warren has weakened. It hurts her deeply, but, she gives up the man. Then in the course of time, the right man comes along and the old love with its bitterness is forgotten.

Warren, the ex-suitor, was not much of a man after all, but Betty, in the goodness of her heart, trying to shield him for her sister, unfortunately incurs the distrust of Tom, and once again she feels her fingers slipping. However, she is so brave and so strong that she routs doubt and dissipates distrust and all the trails that hovered about her disappear and sunshine follows storm. As a finale, however, Gertrude is really grateful and fully able

GEORGE KLEINE.

THE LAST MINUTE (Eclipse—2 parts—Special—Oct. 14).—Arizona Bill is given thirty days in which to prove the authenticity of a will of which he has been appointed executor. The disinherited nephew plots to kidnap Bill and the heiress, so that neither can be on hand at the appointed day.

There follows thirty days of wild excitement, during which the heiress is captured by a hired gang. Even Arizona has a warm time to save his skin until Bill's wife takes a hand in the tussle and shows Bill the tracks of the bandits.

To see Arizona's wild ride on horseback, to see him follow the bandits as they leap upon a passing train by himself leaping from his galloping horse to the vestibule, to see him wage the fight over the roofs of the coaches, into the engine cab, onto the very roof of the engine, and, finally, to see him make a spectacular leap from the locomotive into a river, is to realize what thrills this two-reel affords.

THE WHEELS OF JUSTICE (Cines—2 parts—Special—Oct. 21).—George Townley, a rising young novelist, is hurled from a high bridge and his manuscript stolen by a jealous and unsuccessful rival. At the same time, a bridge constructed by Frank Vincent, brother of George's sweetheart, collapses, killing several men. Frank flies the country in fear of prosecution, and his sudden departure throws suspicion on him for the disappearance of George.

From a start so unusually interesting, the story sweeps on to many strange complications. How George was rescued by peasants; how a peasant girl fell madly in love with him, and how, throughout many trials and adventures, George's sweetheart remained true to him, makes a charming tale, prettily told and charged with action.

THE PENALTY (Cines—2 parts—Special—Nov. 11).—James Moretto, a wood-chopper, in a fit of anger, kills one of his companions. He flees to the woods and finally arrives exhausted at the hut of the peasant, Lawrence. The peasant has a son, Louis, and a daughter, Annie. Annie is attracted instantly by the handsome James. Denied assistance, James again takes to the woods. Hiding in the vicinity of the Lawrence home, he frequently meets Annie and the two grow to love each other.

Meanwhile, the police call at the hut of Lawrence and the old man and his son deny that they have seen the brigand. Annie then confesses to her father and brother that she loves James. In the interim the marshal in charge of the forces that are hunting James, receives a letter from his sister Lucy, stating that his mother is ill and that she worries much about their missing brother. Passing through the woods a few days later, Louis meets James. Unable to give a satisfactory reason for his presence there, the two young men quarrel and James strikes Louis. For revenge Louis informs the marshal of the whereabouts of James. This is overheard by Annie, who hurries into the woods and warns James. The two hurry to the shelter of a barn and a battle takes place between them and the police. Fearing unpleasant gossip, were she found with him, Annie pleads with James to save her. James hides her under the hay and gives himself up to the police.

The marshal is astonished to see that the brigand whom he has hunted so relentlessly is his own brother. James is taken to prison and Annie makes her way to see him and brings him a revolver, in the hope that he might escape. After she leaves, the marshal fights temptation. Torn by the affection for his brother and his duty, the marshal finally weakens and determines to assist his brother out of prison. He enters the cell, but too late, for James, who realizes his brother's purpose, finds that he can no longer accept the sacrifices of others, and takes his own life.

THE LAST DAYS OF POMPEII (6 parts).—Glaucus, a handsome and wealthy Athenian nobleman, living in the city of Pompeii, is the sweetheart of Ione, a Grecian girl of great beauty. Ione's brother, Apaecides, a yaung man of religious tendencies, is the pupil of Arbaces, a crafty, lewd, and unscrupulous Egyptian, high priest of the Temple of Isis. Arbaces has ever nourished an intense but unworthy love for Ione. The Egyptian despises the handsome Glaucus as his rival and plots his downfall. Nydia is a sweet-minded Thessalian flower girl, cursed with blindness at birth and madly loving Glaucus whom she has never seen, but whose kindly voice and ever-ready purse have many times lightened the hand of her cruel mistress, Stratonice, wife of Burbo, an inn keeper.

With his friend, Sallust, Glaucus one evening goes to the tavern of Burbo to place bets on the coming gladitorial contests. He there purchases Nydia from Burbo, after seeing the blind girl frightfully whipped by Stratonice. He takes her to his home.

PART TWO—Arbaces writes a letter to Ione, suggesting that she come and visit him, and intimating that his magic can show her the falsity of Glaucus. Ione accepts the invitation and the Egyptian conjures up a vision, in which Ione sees Glaucus making love to other women. Overcome by emotion, Arbaces embraces her. An instant later he is felled by the heavy hand of Apaecides. Ione flees to the home of Glaucus, where Nydia, her heart torn with jealousy, ministers to the terror-stricken girl. Meanwhile, Apaecides, his faith shattered, prepares to denounce Arbaces and renounce the creed of Isis.

PART THREE—The following morning, Nydia goes to the Temple of Isis to seek solace for her aching heart. She meets Arbaces and confides her love to him. The crafty Egyptian promises to secure from the witch of Vesuvius a love potion, which, if administered to Glaucus, should make him love Nydia forever. Meanwhile, Glaucus and Ione, while strolling on the mountainside, are caught by the rain and seek refuge in the witch's cave. Glaucus brings down the curse of the sorceress by killing her sacred reptile and the lovers leave the cave in panic. Arbaces enters and has little trouble inducing the witch to give him a potion that "shall sear and blast the brain, to make him idiot, raving mad, while yet the heart beats on."

PART FOUR—Nydia meets Adbaces, secures the "love potion" and gives it to Glaucus. The insane man rushes through the streets, reeling from side to side. Meanwhile, Apaecides has had a stormy scene with the Egyptian and goes forth to cool his fevered brain, to the seashore. Arbaces follows and murders him. At that instant the staggering form of Glaucus is seen, and the wary Egyptian promptly seizes him and, calling loudly for help, charges Glaucus with murder. Nydia, who, terror-stricken, had followed Glaucus, is seized by the Egyptian and carried away to his dungeons. Glaucus is haled before the Senate and condemned to die by wild beasts in the arena at the coming games.

PART FIVE—The great day finally arrives, and the mighty stands are crowded with thousands of gay Pompeiians intent upon seeing the rare spectacle of a Patrican thrown to the lions. In her dungeon, Nydia plans escape. She plays upon the superstitions of her negro keeper and succeeds in locking him in her cell. Conscious that it had all been her fault, the blind girl frantically makes her way to the home of Sallust, friend of Glaucus, who had remained home from the great spectacle.

PART SIX—The great spectacle was at its height. There had been parades of the gladiators and the people had howled themselves hoarse over the valor of the gladiatorial combats. Everything was in readiness for the great feature of the day's sport—the death of Glaucus. Already the people yelled impatiently. "Claucus to the lions!" and the Athenian was given a short sword and roughly pushed into the Arena. The hunger-maddened lions sprang from their cages! Suddenly the wild, disheveled form of Sallust appeared, leaping from the boxes and shouting hoarsely, "Remove Glaucus the Athenian! He is innocent! There stands the Murderer!" A guttural roar went up from the assembled thousands, in which could be heard excited cries of "Arbaces to the Lions! Arbaces to the Lions!" At that instant the sky suddenly darkened and from distant Vesuvius there shot into the sky a shaft of hellish fire! Panic seized the multitude and pandemonium reigned. In the confusion Adbaces escaped. The frightful catastrophe restored the reason of the demented Glaucus. He felt the touch of Nydia's hand in his and felt her leading him through the blinding hail of cinders to the home of Ione. They found Ione prepared for death, but the gentle Nydia led them both through the Stygian darkness to the Temple of Isis. Here they met the distracted Arbaces and saw him crushed to death by a falling pillar of his own idolatrous church. Then, in a blackness where only the blind could see, Nydia guided the two lovers to the seashore. Knowing them safely aboard, Nydia suddenly threw herself into the waters of the bay. Her love-task endede, the blind girl at last found' the eternal rest she sought.

ESSANAY.

QUICKSANDS OF SIN (Nov. 4).—It was mother who through false love had sinned. Years later on her deathbed, as the last sacraments were administered, she confesses the folly of her youth. Her husband, a straightforward, conscientious man, had loved the boy as his own. A few days later the priest gives the son a note his mother had left him. The few lines on the first page sting him to the heart, but he does not weaken and his conscience tells him not to turn the leaf of his absolute disaster. The whole truth, the terrible truth, must not be known. His "father" in the next room calls him and the son unflinchingly answers "Father."

THEIR WIVES' INDISCRETION (Nov. 5).—Tom Brown cannot persuade his wife to go sailing with him. Mr. Jones, an intimate friend, is disappointed at not finding Brown home, and invites the latter's wife to take a sail with him. She accepts his kind invitation. Brown has an enjoyable afternoon, and just as he is about to return home meets Mrs. Jones, who has missed the last boat to the resort hotel. He obligingly consents to take her home. Can you imagine the discomfort of all parties mentioned when a terrible rainstorm comes up, and they are forced to land on an island?

THE RUSTLER'S STEP-DAUGHTER (Nov. 6).—The sheriff of Mendocino County receives a letter from Bill Kato, proprietor of a ranch, stating that he is tired of losing his cattle and that if he can't find time to do something in the matter, he will have to see the higher authorities. The Sheriff at once starts out on the trail of the rustlers. He goes to the home of the rustlers and is invited to stay for the night. The men, looking through a crack in the door, see that the caller is a Sheriff.

The men plan to make an easy matter of him. The rustler's step-daughter goes to the assistance of the Sheriff, by delivering a note to his deputies. The Sheriff is overpowered, but the posse arrive in time to save him. Gale sacrifices the freedom of her father for the love and friendship of the Sheriff. A happy ending and a new life is her reward.

BRONCHO BILLY'S SECRET (Nov. 8).—Broncho Billy, sheriff of Cheyenne County, in love with Marguerite Clayton, is accepted by her. Marguerite's father approves of the engagement. Little did Broncho Billy know the father of the girl he is going to marry is a notorious outlaw. After holding up a stage one day Clayton is pursued by the sheriff and his posse. The chase ends by Clayton being shot, and crawling on his hands and knees, he reaches his home. The Sheriff trails him by the blood tracks. Clayton dies, leaving a confession in full, with the Sheriff. Broncho Billy realizes that if Marguerite is told about the life her father had led, it would break her heart so he burns the confession in the stove. Broncho Billy takes Marguerite into his arms and claims her for his own, and promises himself that she will never know the terrible truth.

THE DEATH WEIGHT (Special—2 parts—Nov. 7).—Unable to get their uncle, an old recluse, named Silas Pegg, who lives with his ward, Alice Fisher, to give them more money, Will and Joe, nephews of the old man, threaten to kill him in order to abstract the hiding-place of his fortune. The nephews also plan to divert the crime upon Tom, the sweetheart of Alice. Putting their malevolent intention into practice the nephews enter Tom's room, take his hunting knife and handkerchief, both of which have his initials thereon, and go to Silas' library that night. The lights are quickly put out and in the faint moonlight rays that shine into the room, a knife can be seen flashing quickly and the dim figures of two men hurriedly moving about. The men escape before Alice, who, being summoned by the noise, appears. Unable to solve the upheaval she telephones for the police, who are stationed about five miles away. After a search the police discover the knife and handkerchief belonging to Tom. He is accused of the attempted murder and imprisoned.

Knowing that the old man has a will secretly hidden and also knowing that due to the poor belief he holds in banks, he has his fortune concealed somewhere on his property, Will and Joe again try to make Silas, whom they have detained in the old barn, tell them of the whereabouts of the money. This is witnessed by Alice. She telephones to the police, and the call is received just as Tom is being released on bail. As the officers are on their way to the old barn atrocious acts are being perpetrated by Will and Joe. Old Silas is bound tightly beneath a heavy weight, suspended by a rope, which the nephews intend to cut if the old man again refuses to tell them where he keeps the money. Alice has been beholding the proceedings for some time. Her anger comes to a high pitch and she rushes into the barn, revolver in hand, and commands the release of Silas. But Will is too quick for her and she, too, is bound. For the last time the old man is asked to disclose the concealing place of the money. His refusal causes Will, in a paroxysm of rage, to clutch his knife with which he intends to sever the rope. He drops it and in picking it up notices a secret door on the floor. He investigates and discovers that it is the hiding place of the money. Joe lights a candle and places it in such a position as to burn the rope when it has burned itself to a certain point. The two villains leave their captors to fate and make off to share the spoils. An argument ensues and Will kills his fellow confederate. Meanwhile Alice has managed to wrestle herself loose and rescues Silas just a second before the heavy weight falls crashing to the floor. The police arrive in their automobile and Tom goes in search of Will, whom he finds near the edge of a precipitous cliff. There follows a struggle, in which Tom is victorious. Silas Pegg is profuse in his thanks to Tom for his aid, and Alice places her future life in her sweetheart's care.

PATHEPLAY.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 60—1913 (Oct. 20).—Watsonville, Cal.—A parade in which 6,000 children take part precedes Watsonville's fourth annual apple show.

Denver, Colo.—Motor racers climb three and one-half miles to the top of Mount Falcon and in many places encounter grades 20 per cent steep.

Wentachee, Wash.—Sixty-five cars loaded with apples are hauled by one of the largest engines on the Great Northern Railroad. The cars contain more than 2,000 tons of apples.

New York, N. Y.—Five aviators start from Staten Island field against a high wind for a 60-mile flight around Manhattan in the Aerial Derby.

Boston, Mass.—The new Boston city flag is raised on the Common in connection with the Columbus Day celebration.

San Francisco, Cal.—The blasting of the Panama Canal barrier is celebrated by a parade and a popular demonstration in this city.

St. Louis, Mo.—The unveiling of the monument to Frederick Ludwig Jahn, the originator of modern physical culture, is the crowning event of the German American Alliance's centennial celebration.

Maryville, Mo.—Live stock representing the best product of Missouri is shown at the Fall Festival in this town.

Comic Section.—Mutt makes a new acquaintance under unfortunate circumstances. Drawn by Bud Fisher.

THE VAUDEVILLE STAR'S VACATION (Nov. 4).—An actress at a summer hotel being snubbed by the women guests, determines to get even by disguising herself as a foreign noble. Her deception succeeds—at the start, and attentions are showered upon her, but—"murder will out" and an innocent cigar renders her disguise unavailing.

A YELLOW STREAK (Nov. 5).—A beautiful girl, married to a worthless man without ambition or pride, still believes in him and loves him. She endeavors to secure a position for him, but without success. By chance she meets a young author, on whom her attractiveness makes a deep impression, and he learns of her unsuccessful efforts to get her husband a position, and for her sake offers to make him his private secretary. He then meets the husband, only to recognize in him one of the men with whom he had previously had a quarrel when he had interposed to save a poor old washerwoman from an unwarranted attack. However, for the girl's sake he forgives the husband and gives him the position. The husband repays his generosity with faithlessness and in order to get money to pay his gambling debts breaks into the author's house in the dead of night. He is caught red handed and in the struggle kills himself by accident. His mask is removed and his identity discovered. To shield the girl the author tells her that her husband was killed in saving him from burglars. But the truth comes out and the rascality of the dead man made clear. So the girl is later won by the man whose manliness is all the more apparent since it had the black background of her husband.

RACE MEMORIES (Special—2 parts—Nov. 6).—Denton, an anthropologist of note, meets by accident a new neighbor, an attractive girl, whose father insists upon her marriage to a man whom he favors because of his wealth. Denton and the girl are mutually attracted and to Denton comes a vague but haunting belief that they have met before. Worn out by overstudy, he becomes seriously ill with rain fever and the mind pictures he has of his fair neighbor fade into a vision of a prehistoric existence, where he wanders as a stone age savage, meets and loves the girl of his heart, who also lives in that strange world. There also is the conflict between wealth and poverty, the father's choice opposed to the daughter's. The prehistoric Denton finally wins out after struggling with a savage rival and wild beasts as well. Just so the modern Denton finally conquers over his modern rival.

A PHONY ALARM (Nov. 7).—Alice wanted to go on the stage and her actor cousin wrote her he would give her the chance. On her wedding day she gets word that he is in town and delays the wedding to get him on the phone and ask him over. But the actor is busy rehearsing his great death scene and annoyed by the ringing of the phone bell takes the receiver off the hook and leaves it. And then comes trouble in bunches. The groom is arrested as a murderer, the little bride is distracted and the wedding finally takes place in a police court.

TORTOISES AT CLOSE RANGE (Nov. 8).—An interesting educational showing the water tortoise at home both on land and in water. One of the most interesting parts depicts the intense rivalry between several of the strange little reptiles over a bit of food.

EGYPTIAN TEMPLES (Nov. 8).—Massive and imposing memorials of an extinct race, showing also the mighty statues of ancient and almost forgotten Kings.

ICE-CUTTING IN SWEDEN (Nov. 8).—An interesting travel picture showing the profitable winter harvest of the Northland.

PATHEPLAY'S WEEKLY, NO. 59, 1913 (Oct. 16).—Indianapolis, Ind.—Hundreds of school children pay tribute to the poet, James Whitcomb Riley on the anniversary of his birth.

Denver, Colo.—Secretary of the Interior Franklin K. Lane arrives here to study conditions relative to the proposed expenditure of $1,500,000 on government irrigation in Colorado.

New York, N. Y.—The Giants wind up the season by beating Philadelphia in two games, 12 to 7 and 7 to 5.

MELIES.

THE JAPANESE SWORD MAKER (General Film Exclusive Service Program—2 parts—Week Commencing Oct. 27).—A powerful Daimyo, of Japan, wishing to possess the finest weapon in the realm, summons the leading sword makers of the land. Their samples fail to please. Kami, the Daimyo's favorite, has just received a sword of great excellence from Sato, a seclusive but upright maker, and so pleased is he with it that he presents Sato to the Daimyo. Sato gets the order, much to the disgust of Bobu, one of the rejected bidders. To frustrate Sato's success, Bobu resorts to trickery. He forces Sato's apprentice to steal the exact measurements and design of the sword while in the process of making. With these he makes a duplicate.

In time the master sword is completed and Sato's private trade-mark placed upon it. The highly tempered steel passes Sato's rigid test of the iron bar. All is in readiness to deliver it to the Daimyo next day. Sato and his wife guard it like a treasure and upon retiring that night, place it between them. Nobu steals into the house in the dead of night and carefully removing the sword from between the sleeping couple, substitutes his own of like appearance but inferior quality. Next day the Daimyo receives Sato in court. An iron bar is brought for the test. Sato makes the test. The blade breaks. He is dismissed in disgrace.

Sato returns home dejected. He shows the broken blade to his daughter, who notices that there is no trade mark thereon. The truth dawns upon them, but it is now too late for explanations. His professional reputation and business are ruined. He suffers his calvary in that former friends and admirers pass him unnoticed on the streets. And Kami, the Daimyo's favorite, returns his own splendid sword made by Sato, as a thing unworthy. In desperation Sato would commit Hara-kiri, but is saved in the nick of time by his wife and daughter, who did cheer. The family move from town to escape ridicule. In new environments he fails to find work and his sick wife to lessen the burden, herself commits Hara-kiri.

Five years later finds Sato and his daughter returned to their native village under an assumed name. They conduct a prosperous fan business and one of their customers, a young nobleman, just returned from abroad, woos and asks the hand of the girl in marriage. Without revealing his name he takes his fiancée and Sato to his home, where, to the latter's surprise and astonishment, he discovers in the boy's father, none other than his original sword passes the test before the Daimyo, former friend and patron, Kami. And in Kami's which he proves by the trade mark. Nobu had sold it to the favorite. Nobu is sent for and his life is spared only on the condition that he would confess all to the Daimyo. And the next day Sato's possession he finds the sword made for the Daimyo, Nobu is placed under arrest, Sato restored to favor, and the engagement of Sato's daughter and Kami's son consented to by the Daimyo.

A JAPANESE WEDDING (Oct. 30).—The proposal is made, not by the intended bridegroom, but by his best friend, who visits the intended bride and her mother, lays the proposition before them and exchanges gifts. No priest is present at the ceremony, it being performed by the bridegroom's best man and the bride's attendant. The ceremonious sipping of tea constitutes the principal part of the function. The bride, in herself serving the bridegroom's parents with tea, indicates her everlasting submission to their wishes. Such are the Japanese.

BIOGRAPH.

DIVERSION (Nov. 3).—Indifference had long fanned the breach between the young Wilsons. Consequently, the young wife found the jolly workman a pleasing diversion and proceeded to amuse herself. Her husband was thrown in with the workman's wife and thereby things became interesting and complicated until a dangerous predicament of the poor folks' child brought them to realize their folly.

OLD COUPONS (Nov. 8).—He was an East Side rag-picker, who earned the greater part of his living by begging coupons in front of cigar stores. Tony, sent out for "beer money" by the gang, saw the old man's hands filled with nickels. In the following scuffle little Dolly Tracy came to the rescue. "Old Coupons" never forgot.

IN THE HANDS OF THE BLACK HANDS (Nov. 6).—The city was in the hands of the black hands down to the black hands of the black-faced cops. Lily loved the black chief and showed the love by a fine, fat roasted chicken. That is what started the next scandal for the newspapers. Fired by Mrs. Kash for this offense, Lily tried the black hand stunt, and believe me, Mrs. Hard Kash came over.

WHERE'S THE BABY (Nov. 6).—It was an eventful time Mrs. Malone's baby had, while she was off settling the kids that sauced her. But Billy and May got in some good work meantime, baffling cruel papa, an affair in which Baby Malone played no small part.

GIRLS WILL BE BOYS (Nov. 4).—Pearl and Jess decide to have some fun with their sweethearts, Chester and Archie. Archie is giving a party and the girls not being invited make up their minds to disguise as boys and have some fun on their own hook. Jess dances to Pearl's music and a great crowd gathers. Archie sees them and invites them into his party. They go, and entertain. They are given some money. On their departure they kiss their respective sweethearts, much to their surprise. When they are gone, Chester misses his pocketbook and suspects the "boys" of having stolen it. He gives chase to them and they run. Jess is finally caught, but Pearl comes to her rescue and beats Chester off by pulling his hair. Chester returns and his pocketbook is found. That evening the girls let their beaus into their secret that they were the "boys" who caused all the fun.

IT'S A SHAME TO TAKE THE MONEY (Nov. 4).—Belmont and Geraldine are sweethearts. Her father objects to him. Belmont puts up a game on the old man. He gets his wash woman to dress in his mother's finery and has Geraldine introduce her to her father as a countess. The old man takes to the drudge and falls in love with her. In the park he forgets himself and while making love to her, kisses her. Belmont photographs the kiss. The next day he shows the old man the wash woman performing his duties and he nearly faints. Belmont shows him the picture and the old man agrees to the marriage. Belmont also makes him pay a large sum of money to keep his secret from his wife.

WHEN DUTY CALLS (Nov. 9).—Grace is a lady's maid in the home of the Wilsons. Her sweetheart is detective "Bob" Curley. Her brother is a loafer and one day while delivering a message to Grace steals some jewels belonging to Mrs. Wilson. "Bob" is detailed to the case. Later, he sees two men dividing the loot and arrests one. He recognizes from the description the stolen jewels. He gives chase to the other. The other man runs up a fire escape and into Grace's home, with "Bob" in pursuit. Ned, for he is the culprit, begs Grace to shield him and he hides under his mothers bed. "Bob" enters and asks Grace if she saw a man enter. She says no, but her mother seeing a man under her bed screams and "Bob" rushes up. There he finds Ned and drags him out. Grace pleads with her lover not to arrest her brother, but he is obdurate in the performance of his duty. Ned is sent to jail and Grace breaks her engagement to "Bob." Two years later, on his release from prison, "Bob" gets Ned a job and Grace learning of this makes up with the honest officer.

JOKER.

LOVE AND LIMBURGER (Nov. 8).—Billy, on his way to collect a water bill from the grocer, meets Molly, the grocer's daughter, and falls in love with her, unaware of her identity. At the store Billy threatens to turn off the water and the grocer pays up his bill. When Molly appears Billy starts a flirtation. A crowd of Germans approach and the leader, eating a limburger sandwich, imagines that the kisses the girl is throwing are meant for him.

Billy places flowers on Molly's window. Dutch sees this and places a sandwich besides the flowers, producing complications when the girl comes after the bouquet. Meanwhile, Billy, in his anxiety to get to Molly, conceals himself in an empty box and is carried into the store. Dutch also conceals himself in a barrel and lands in the store. After the store has closed, they come out and commence fighting. The police are called in by the grocer. Billy plays the hero and is offered anything by the thankful father. He points to a box, in which the girl has secreted herself. Taking the box outside the girl comes out and they are married immediately. Dutch escapes from his captives, the old man is wised to the trick and the three meet on the steps of the court house. Explanations follow and in the end Billy is married at the church, with the Dutch band playing a wedding march.

NESTOR.

WESTERN HEARTS (Nov. 5).—The sheriff and his deputy are rivals for the hand of Nell. She chooses the sheriff, though she likes the youthful deputy well. The latter, hearing the news, is crushed, but carries his defeat manfully. Nell and the sheriff are married and all goes well until her brother, a weakling, is inveigled into a raid by a gang of cattle thieves. While out riding Nell observes her brother with the thieves and rushes back to her home where the deputy, seeing her agitation, inquires the cause. She informs him that her brother is in trouble and then turns away, noting the approach of her husband. The sheriff, taking in her agitation and their secret conversations, becomes suspicious. When word comes of the theft both men depart to hunt down the culprits. Parting ways the deputy comes upon the brother with the cattle and successfully urges him to return with the cattle for his sister's sake. The deputy then returns and tells the sister what he has done; but while they talk the sheriff approaches from the outside. Discovering the deputy is in his house the sheriff is furious; he tears the badge from his coat. At the end the brother pays dearly for his crime and the sheriff is made to realize his awful mistake in believing his wife untrue.

HIS WIFE'S BURGLAR (Nov. 7).—Patient Mac is annoyed by his wife's continuous fear of burglars. He is called from the office, called from bed and called from various other places to chase imagined intruders. Determined to cure his wife of her weakness he buys a mask and takes it home with him.

Eddie and his wife, Romona, have in the meantime moved into the flat next to Mac's flat. Eddie that evening goes to the club instead of hanging the pictures. After reading the announcements of raids Stella retires. Mac has secreted himself under the bed. While he is there a real burglar enters and poceeds to work. Later Eddie returns, and, under liquor's influence, enters Mac's flat instead of his own. The burglar gets under the bed and Mac meets him. There is a struggle. Mac pursues him to the next room and both collide with Eddie.

Stella telephones for the police. When they arrive they experience difficulty in picking out the burglar from the other two men. But the wives come to their rescue and lead their respective husbands off by the ear and the intruder is taken to jail.

FRONTIER.

SLIM GETS THE REWARD (Nov. 6).—Bob hired Slim Hoover only because the Bar S Ranch was short of men, not because Slim was a particularly experienced hand. One look at the new man and the boys "dub" him the "boob." His assurance annoyed the boys, so they combined in forcing him from the bunk house into the kitchen, where they felt he rightly belonged.

Another interest prevents the boys from further abuse of Slim. A greaser, discharged that morning, rounded out his career of thieving by stealing the pick of the corral. The boys are ordered to round up the culprit. Slim is pressed into service by the mistress of the ranch to assist in preparing sandwiches and coffee for the trip. Instead of sugar to sweeten the boys' coffee, Slim puts in a sleeping potion.

How the boys after capturing the Mexican go to sleep on the job; how the culprit escapes and how Slim turns the tables on all and captures the $500 and the heart of the widow are pictured in a realistic yet broadly humorous manner.

THE GIRL AND THE BANDIT (Nov. 8).—En route to the postoffice Nina makes the acquaintance of a stranger. His gallant ways, the kindness displayed toward her impresses Nina much and she is terrified, on arriving at the village, to find that her new friend is probably the outlaw who recently held up the stage coach.

She returns home to her father with a letter, which demands $1,000 for the mortgage held against him. Nina persuades her father to seek the assistance of the inn keeper. Arriving at the village with her father, the girl discovers a sign posted offering $1,000 reward for the apprehension of her friend, the outlaw. Thinking only of her father for the time being she, accompanied by him, go after the stranger, capture him and return him to town. To prevent lynching him he is rustled to the jail, where he is identified by the driver and passengers of the coach.

Repenting her action, she visits the jail that evening. The stranger proves to her satisfaction that he is not the man wanted, and also tells her where the real bandit might be found. Out into the night she goes; after hours of riding she returns with another, the image of the first man. James Young it was, the first man captured, who had come out West as a secret service man to capture the bandit in question. He is freed, shows his credentials and returns with the girl and the bandit to Arizona.

POWERS.

THE LESSON THE CHILDREN TAUGHT (Nov. 3).—Hubby wishes to attend the club. Wifey weeps and in that it is a habit of her's to get on the man's nerves. Mother-in law assures daughter that she should not put up with such a man. Hubby returns drunk and knocks over some statuary. Wifey and mother-in-law lecture him and the three children come from bed and listen behind the screen.

The next morning at the breakfast table there is another scene. Mother-in-law goes to her room and prepares to leave forever, urging the wife to do the same.

In the meantime the three children having tired of their play, decide to play grown-ups. They dress as "papa" and "grandma." Left alone in the front room they imitate their parents in the scene enacted the night before and that morning, hubby returning with the decision that he will be master of his own home, observes the play through the window. Mother-in-law and daughter come down and peek through the curtains in time to see the excellent impersonation of themselves. The parents realize the foolishness of their actions and make up and hug the children for the lesson they have taught.

THE HEART OF A CRACKSMAN (Nov. 7).—Carlton, disapproving of his dissipated son and the latter's scheming wife, on his death-bed makes his will in favor of his devoted niece, Marcia. Hearing of this the previous couple plan to balk the father, their scheming is overheard by the cracksman, who has stealthily entered the house. The son and his wife retire and the cracksman creeps upstairs and enters Marcia's room. Affected by her beauty and innocence as she lays sleeping, he determines to assist her; following the son into the sick man's room he snatches the stolen will from his hand. Impatient at the delay the wife goes to the room and finds her husband stunned. She screams. The father awakens, gropes about and falls dead. In his own apartment the cracksman looks over the document and later he reads in the papers where the question of millions is at stake. Making a dummy he takes them both to the house where the original came from in time to prevent Marcia being bundled out. Holding the dummy up the cracksman extorts money from the son for it and then burns it. But ere the son can take possession the real will is brought forth; he holds the scheming couple at bay while Marcia makes her escape.

IMP.

THE TEMPTATION OF JANE (2 parts—Nov. 3). —As a country girl she finds herself in the vast city full of ambition to be somebody in the world. Partially against her parents' wishes she has come and when she fails to secure work after long hours of tramping her heart grows sad. Too proud to tell the truth, she writes a letter to her folks, saying that she has met with success, and then she throws herself on the bed and sobs out her anguish.

In the room next to her's there is a girl of a different type, Irene Wallace, a model for Rupert Strong, the famous artist. Hearing the sobs she seeks out the room and tries to comfort the girl. Struck with her pretty face she takes Jane the following day and introduces her to her employer. Strong hires her to pose for him.

In her new position she meets a class of men she is unaccustomed to; she is fascinated with their reckless ways and gallant attention. One particularly attracts her—Harry Charlton, son of the late Barley King, who is by riotous living burning up his father's fortune. Jane is tempted with costly gowns and but for the advice of her friend would accept them. A letter from her mother seems to steady her, though not to the extent that she refuses Charlton's invitation to one of his freak dinners.

It is her birthday. Though dressed rather simply her demureness charms the men and she is the center of attraction at the ball. Unknown to Jane her mother has arrived in the city to be with her on the night of her birthday. Irene, fearful for Jane's welfare, decides to take the mother to her.

In the meantime Charlton has found one of Jane's letters written by the mother. The simple, homely prayers penned by the mother for her daughter's safety pierces the cast iron cynicism of the man; he determines that no harm shall come to her. He commands the orgy to cease just as the mother arrives. In the hall Charlton meets the mother and asks for the hand of her daughter. He returns with Jane to the drawing-room, where the girls' bare necks are covered and the wine removed and introduces his future wife and her mother. All the guests cluster around the old lady, who tells them about her child when she was a little girl; it is the beginning of a new life for many of them.

THE OLD PARLOR (Nov. 6).—Tom returns from college and marries Jane. Their favorite place on the farm is the old parlor with its organ, rag carpet, old table and family album. They go to the city, where Tom prospers in business. Bridge parties and cigarette smoking by his wife's city friends cause a breach that constantly widens until separation is the only solution of their troubles. Jane returns home and informs her parents of her intentions. Going to the city the old father tries to bring about a reconciliation, but fails. Back home the old parents decide on a plan that they believe might bring it about

To the city they ship the old furniture from the parlor. It arrives while the young couple are out and the parents install it. When Tom and Jane return prepared to divide the furniture they find a surprise; the old folks hidden, see the puzzled and amazed look over the faces of their children. Standing gazing over the old album and its photographs their hearts are drawn together. The reconciliation is complete.

ECLAIR.

THE REFORMATION OF CALLIOPE (2 parts—Nov. 5).—Calliope Martins, the sole support of his widowed mother, leaves for the West to make his fortune. Three years elapse and he falls into evil ways. Turning to drink and gambling, things go from bad to worse until he is stamped as a thoroughly bad man and gun fighter.

Meantime the mother, unable to stand the suspense, packs up and departs for the West in search of her son. Just before she arrives in the village the above mentioned running gun fight takes place. The boy has taken refuge in the station. A sheriff has followed and has been subdued by him and as Calliope rises to gaze out the window at the other pursuers he sees his mother alight from the train. It is a great moment—the man loves his mother more than drink, more than gambling, more than anything in the world and his heart grows heavy with the fear that she will discover him as he is. Pinning the badge of his captive on his own breast he meets the little mother as she enters. The reunion is pathetic.

She leaves the room for a minute and Calliope now thoroughly ashamed returns the badge and gun, offering to give himself up. The sheriff says "keep the badge on, I have promised her and you shall be sheriff until she leaves town." They leave the station and later Calliope is sworn in as a deputy sheriff, under the promise that he will make good for his mother's sake.

How this man-boy makes good, how he goes out single-handed and brings about the capture of Mexican bad men is all interestingly portrayed in scenes of exquisite coloring and vital action.

THE AMBLYSTOMA (Nov. 9).—A unique subject showing a peculiar species of fish, called "Amblystoma." These are displayed in the various stages from emerging in the embryo state until fully developed. Varieties of this fish are also shown and their methods of killing and eating live prey.

Close-up views show the head and body of the fish, and its movements in the water are also clearly seen. When taken from the water this fish loses its gills and assumes an entirely different shape.

OH! WHAT A DREAM (Nov. 9).—Tightwad balks when friend wife shows him the bill for her new hat, which she calls "a dream." They quarrel—she strikes him. He returns the compliment. She finds a note from Mazie, asking Tightwad to meet her at the cabaret the night before. Before a referee the couple tell their troubles with the idea of getting a divorce. They are told that witnesses must be had to their battles. They proceed to pommel each other before him, but he explains the witness must be an outside party. They leave the house and start things again before an old man sitting under a tree. When they call upon him to witness the fight they discover he is blind. Their efforts to gain a witness continue.

Discouraged and disheartened two days later they come to the referee, hobbling on crutches and swathed in bandages. Taking a bottle labeled "Drops of good sense" he sprinkles some on a rag and putting their two heads together, lay the bandage over them. They drop off into a peaceful dream and awaken wrapped in each other's embrace, their troubles forgotten.

REX.

THE PRIMEVAL TEST (2 parts—Nov. 6).—Dr. Harrison, a student of human nature, believes that environment largely molds one's character. He writes as much to his friend, Bob Stannard, who, owing to business, has been neglecting his wife. Resenting this, his wife has permitted the attentions of Dr. Harrison, an old admirer.

Bob discovers the slight affair between his wife and the friend and he realizes that something must be done—that his place in the wife's affections are threatened. On the following day he calls upon the doctor and recounts his troubles. He is reminded of the primeval days when men carried their women to lonely caves and held them until worldly cares were forgotten. The suggestion strikes home to the disconsolate husband.

In the meantime Bob's wife has decided to leave him and join the admirer. Bob learns of it and as she is about to depart takes her by main force, blindfolds her and carries her bodily to an auto. In the lonely hills he forces her to dress in skins while he adopts the same garb. Although he longs to take her in his arms he is stern and compels her to obey. As time goes on she admires his strength and finds his domination less irksome. A final test is decided upon. A letter is sent to the old admirer by the doctor, informing him of the whereabouts of Mrs. Stannard. The misguided youth starts in search—he comes upon her in the strange garb. Bob, waiting, surprises both and drives the interloper off and the wife demonstrates that she is fully conquered and love is complete for her husband.

THE HAUNTED BRIDE (Nov. 9).—Lydia, the daughter of an affluent father and mother, is loved by her tutor. Unused to men, she is attracted by him and would continue to be so but for the arrival of Sterling Paul, the son of an old friend of the family. Both young people fall in love at first sight. In anguish the tutor threatens to kill himself. This threat works upon the girl's nerves and when Sterling is called to his home she consents to a hurried marriage. As the bride is departing with her husband the tutor induces the maid to allow him to deliver the bridal bouquet. Lydia finds a note inside, which says that the tutor has committed suicide and will haunt her forever. Superstitious and nervous, it works upon her mind and constantly she sees a vision of the disappointed man about to kill himself. Her gradual decline in health causes the husband's anxiety and finally he prevails upon her to return home in hope that the old scenes may bring back strength. Arriving she observes the tutor in the garden playing with the maid; her relief is pitiable. The tutor was about to commit suicide when his hand was stayed by the little maid and his affections gradually turn to her.

VICTOR.

THE RING OF SORROW (Nov. 3).—Francesca receives the news that her sweetheart, Pietro, has been killed in a quarrel. Broken-hearted, she lavishes all her love and grief on the engagement ring that was previously given her. Later, misfortune falls on the family. Her mother, suspecting that the dead man's ring is the cause of it, steals the ring from the girl's finger while she sleeps and casts it out in the street.

Next morning the ring is found and taken to the home of a ragpicker. For a while fortune seems to smile upon Francesca's family. In the meanwhile Mario, a young Italian, discovers the ring in the old man's possession and suspecting him forces a confession. The girl is identified by the old man, who has seen her searching the streets for her ring. Mario is struck by the girl's beauty and decides to win her love. He intends giving the ring to her as an engagement present.

When the ring is offered her, after she has given her love, all the past tragic history connected with it springs before her mind and she rejects the present. The old ragpicker, half drunk, goes in the night to regain the ring from Mario. He falls downstairs and is killed. The boy is held as a suspect. Next morning Francesca tells her story to the district attorney and the prisoner is released. Together, Francesca and Mario go down to the river, where they ceremoniously consign the fatal ring to its depths and face a happy life together.

THE END OF THE ROAD (2 parts—Nov. 7).—Worthing, a rich young bachelor, lost in the woods at night while hunting, makes his way to an old inn. Foolishly he flashes a rill of bills; the inn keeper and his partner, Slavin, plan to rob him. Dora, the inn keeper's daughter, overhears the plot and having been impressed by the stranger, assists him to escape. Later, discovering this the men turn her out. Some hours later she comes upon Worthing and he in pity installs her in a house as maid, which he rents. Under his guidance Dora changes to a cultivated woman. Love takes the place of pity in the man's heart and when their love is about to culminate in marriage, Worthing is called away to attend his sick father.

When he returns he learns that his sweetheart has been kidnapped by her father. After a fruitless attempt to find her he departs for an extended tour to heal a broken heart. Later, the father and friend are sent to prison. Dora with her baby, determines to go back to the village to seek her sweetheart. She is found in a sad plight by the roadside by Mrs. Leslie, who finding that she is so gifted obtains for her a position as companion to John Sloane, the uncle of Frank Sloane, Worthington's dearest friend.

John falls in love with the girl and after a time she marries him for the sake of his child, believing that she will never see her former sweetheart again. Frank returns with his friend John from the trip and they answer the invitation of John to visit at his country place. The meeting between Dora and Worthing is pitiful. Dora's father has escaped and after Worthing has departed he makes his way to John's house and tells him of his daughter's past. He demands money to keep silent. The shock of his wife's history weighs heavily on Sloane and he dies in a short time. After several exciting incidents, in which Dora's father is killed, the young couple are brought together and the old love newly awakened fills their longing hearts.

BISON.

CAPTAIN KIDD (3 parts—Nov. 4).—The story, in brief, relates to that famous character of history, Captain Kidd, from the time he became a pirate until his fall. According to history he was sent out to subdue piracy by King William III of England, who had heard of this captain's ability in combating these wolves of the marine commerce. Kidd starts out with good impulses. A misunderstanding with his sweetheart, whom he was about to marry, changed the tenure of his life; from a law abiding citizen he suddenly was transformed into a fiend. He embarked with embittered thoughts that soon answered the summons of rancor; he fell for the temptation to reap an easy fortune through piracy.

Ever actuated by the gnawings of a self-imposed broken heart, Kidd ruled with unpitying hand. A poor wretch, one of his own crew, whom he had ordered thrown overboard for no reason whatever nearly caused Kidd's downfall.

In the meantime Peggy, his sweetheart, had pined through sorrow. The American shores invited. It was thought a change would do her good and she embarked with her father. Through a strange act of fate this ship fell a prey to the ever watchful eye of Kidd's crew. Battle and carnage reigned. Peggy recognized her old sweetheart directing the killing. When he finds her she has been mortally wounded. Gathering her in his strong arms he totters with unseeing eyes to the forward deck, where she dies. The man whose life had been seared through his own jealous nature becomes again as a child with a grief that was simple and sincere.

THE PRAIRIE TRAIL (2 parts—Nov. 8).—Chief Dakota sends the Indian maiden, Red Wing, to the fort to sell beads. The chief's son, Eagle Claw, is anxious to accompany her, but is refused. He follows and observes that she disposes of most of her goods to Lieutenant Clifford, who in turn gives them to his sweetheart, Margaret. Later Clifford is sent in charge of a company to put down boot-legging. Leaving his party to do some spy work, Clifford comes upon Eagle Claw abusing the Indian girl. He interferes and there is a fight, wherein the Indian is shot in the wrist by the girl. He vows vengeance.

Meantime the soldiers have met and defeated the bootleggers and Indians who buy from them. Scar Eye escapes and joins the construction gang. Clifford visits the chief and orders him to prevent his people from buying whiskey. Later the chief dies and his son comes into control. Scar Eye, nursing a hate, persuades his Indian friends to join him in an attempt to rob the train. Colonel Burton and his daughter, Margaret, have boarded this same train. Red Wing hears of the intended assault and while she rides to the fort for help she sends her sister to stop the train.

The Indians take the powder from the construction gang and prepare to blow up the train. Red Wing reaches the fort and informs Clifford of the trouble. She leads them away. Her sister has come up with the train, has made a daring leap from her horse into the cab of the moving engine and succeeded in making the engineer see the danger ahead. The train is stopped not a moment too soon; there is a terrific explosion ahead. The soldiers arrive and attack the Indians. Clifford engages in a hand-to-hand fight with Scar-Eye; he draws his gun and fires. Red Wing, to protect unnecessary bloodshed, steps in between and takes the bullet meant for the bootlegger. Clifford turns his attention to the dying girl as his own sweetheart and father come running up from the train.

THE GIRL AND THE GREASER (Nov. 3).—Dave Lewis, a poor young homesteader, lives with his invalid sister, Ruth. She is in need of medical treatment, but Dave has no money with which to provide it. He calls upon Betty, his sweetheart. Returning with the money, Dave places it in the clock for safe keeping and is seen through the door by Manuel, his Mexican servant. Ruth grows worse and Dave sends for Betty to stay with her while he goes for medicine. When Dave has departed for town, Betty discovers he has forgotten his pocketbook, and asks Manuel to overtake Dave and give it to him. Manuel insolently refuses and Betty, infuriated, departs upon the errand herself. When she is gone, Manuel enters the house, imprisons Donna, the old Mexican servant, and steals the money from the clock. He then sets fire to the shack and departs. Betty arrives just in time to save the invalid, then leaving Ruth in charge of the old Mexican woman, sets out bravely in search of Manuel. She is soon upon his trail, but realizes suddenly that she is unarmed, and therefore utterly helpless to cope with him. She has about given up in despair when the Mexican stops at a mountain stream for water.

As he stoops over the stream to drink, Betty, seizing the opportunity, slips from her pony, creeps upon Manuel, snatches the gun from his holster and commands him to throw up his hands. The frightened Mexican obeys, and Betty recovers the stolen money. As she is about to lead him away, Manuel wheels suddenly and plunges into the water and escapes. Dave, returning from town, is listening, horrified, to Ruth's story, when Betty arrives with the money, and once more brings light and happiness into the hearts of the ranchman and his little invalid sister.

WHAT HER DIARY TOLD (Nov. 6).—Janet Warren, in love with Harold King, marries John Wilbur, a wealthy young man of high social standing. On the night of their marriage, Janet confides the story of her love for Harold to her diary. One evening on going into her boudoir, John finds her diary on the dressing table and reads it. He is stunned and decides to leave her immediately and make it possible for her to marry the man she loves.

He arranges with his attorneys for a monthly allowance of two thousand dollars to be given her and all his wealth at his death, and then leaves for unknown parts to become a prospector. All efforts to trace Wilbur proving unavailing, the young wife slowly pines away. On the earnest solicitation of her physician, she goes into the mountains to seek comfort and new environment.

An unexpected explosion injures two prospectors, one of which is John Wilbur. As they are carrying the injured men away, Janet passes in her auto. In gazing upon the second victim of the catastrophe, she recognizes her husband. He is then placed in her car and after a hurried trip to the rough shack taken up by the men as their home in the mountains, every aid is rendered. John heroically turns from her, but on the earnest pleadings and sincere protestations of love on the part of Janet, the two are reconciled to a life of happiness.

THE HAUNTED HOUSE (Nov. 8).—Ethel Graham is the village belle. She finally says she will marry the first man who will stay a whole night in the haunted house. Finally, Bob determines to stay the night in the house. After telling his intention, he writes a note to Ethel, telling her she may never see him again and with shaking knees starts off. Ethel and the boys all awed by his bravery steal out that evening on a walk. Bob approaches the house, gets to the gate, sees the flash of a sudden light, becomes panic stricken and runs away. Ethel and the boys pass him on the road running like a hound.

A stranger comes to town and falls a willing victim to the charms of Ethel. They are about to be engaged when she recalls the conditions she imposed upon her other suitors. The stranger accepts the dare and Ethel, thinking to play a practical joke on him, provides herself with a sheet and gains entrance to the alleged haunted house. Hearing footsteps she covers herself with the sheet, and crouches in a corner where the opium smugglers, who had been using the place as a rendezvous, find her. She is bound and ordered taken to sea. On the beach her screams for help bring the stranger, Richard Phillips, on his way to the alleged haunted house, to her rescue. The smugglers are captured by Phillips, who turns out to be a government officer. The stranger was no trifler and Ethel is delighted with the opportunity to be a help-meet to him for life.

THANHOUSER.

THE SILVER TONGUED ORATOR (Oct. 26).—This is the story of a grocery clerk, who was slowly but surely rising in his profession. The customers liked him and his employer was satisfied. Furthermore, he was in love with a most desirable young woman. Then all was changed, for he decided to become an orator.

It would have been bad enough had he been a natural speaker, or even if he had taken lessons at a school of elocution. This young man, however, fell under the spell of a Correspondence School of Oratory.

He made speeches everywhere. The result was that his fiancee jilted him, his friends fled from him and the boss, who had approved of him, fired him.

Being out of work, he decided that the best thing to do was to utilize what he fondly styled his "Heaven born gift" by becoming an assemblyman. The political party to which he belonged gave a clambake about that time, and the clerk determined to spout eloquence so masterfully that all eyes would be turned upon him. They were, but not in the way he had imagined they would be. He made his speech, or at least started it, then some husky policemen arrived and threw him further than any man had ever been before. His thoughts then turned to love, but when he arrived at his sweetheart's home he was just in time to hear her accept another suitor, first bidding him never to become an orator. It was a bitter blow to the clerk, but he comforted himself with the thought that he still had his silver tongue left, and he still makes speeches on every subject whenever he gets a chance.

HOW FILMY WON HIS SWEETHEART (Oct. 28).—Filmy, an operator at a picture palace, visits his sweetheart, proposes to her, but is rejected by her father, on the plea that his position is too humble, and two guineas not enough to support Stella. Filmy is decidedly absent minded on account of this, with the result that he puts a feature film on the screen backward, for which he gets the "bounce." He then gets a job as cameraman with a local producer, but instead of taking local flower show he takes a policeman spooning with a servant maid; then some lovers in the park, and finally wanders into Lord Montgomery's grounds, and takes his lordship spooning with the cook. "I will give you 5,000 pounds to destroy that film. If my wife sees it, I am ruined," says the lord. Filmy accepts and Stella's pa willingly accepts Filmy as a son-in-law with his newly acquired wealth.

A TWENTIETH CENTURY FARMER (Oct. 31).—Her parents were anxious and believed she would be advanced in the social scale by marrying a young banker, who is very attentive to her. The girl, however, regarded this suitor as a pin head.

At a dance one evening she met a real man, and it was a case of love at first sight on both sides. There was nothing slow about the new suitor and within a month he had won the girl's consent to their marriage. When he asked her parents for her hand, however, trouble ensued, because when questioned as to his business he had to admit that he was a farmer.

The thought of their child as a farmer's wife was too much for the old folks, and they forbade the match. The girl was steadfast in her love, but at first refused to elope with the young man. She told him that she was not fitted to be a farmer's wife because she knew absolutely nothing about how to care for a farm or a kitchen. She determined to learn, however, and spent her vacation on a run down old farm, learning how to milk cows, make bread, and chop wood. In the Fall she told her sweetheart that she was now competent to assume her position and consented to elope with him.

After their marriage he took her to his farm, which she found with surprise to be a model structure noted all over the United States. She did not have to do the chores or get up at 4 a. m., or blow a fish horn to call the hired men to dinner. In fact, she was far better off than she ever had been at home. Even her parents admitted it, especially when they found out that the banker whom they revered was only a $10 a week clerk with no prospects of ever being anything more.

MAJESTIC.

THE SCENARIO WRITER (Oct. 26).—Brown is a scenario writer. Bills come in and he has to get an idea quickly. His brain won't work and putting on coat and hat he strolls out of the house in quest of inspiration. Lighting a stogie, he stands on the curb thinking. He buys a newspaper and sees an item relating to a would-be burglar whose tender heart impels him to turn doctor and save the child of his intended victim. This strikes Brown as good stuff and he hurries home to commit it to paper.

A little later he issues forth, the scenario completed, and visits the Majestic Picture Company, on the stage of which he is greeted by the director, who buys his scenario. The picture is taken and put on at one of the local theaters. Meanwhile numerous other scenario writers get hold of the same idea in one way or another and immediately after the performance of Brown's play put in a claim of ownership. They all meet on the stage of the Majestic and a general fight ensues, each claiming the idea as his own. The property men turn the hose on the contesants, whom with Brown and the director repair to the police court to settle their difficulties. The magistrate awards the case to Brown.

THE OATH OF O'TSURU SAN (2 parts—Oct. 28).—O'Tsuru San Nuaki, the daughter of Gen. Nuaki, a distinguished Japanese army officer, has been trained from childhood to consider her country's interests above everything. Ned Winthrop, a young American, who has invented a new torpedo boat, which is the superior of any in use, visits Japan and is entertained by Gen. Nuaki, who seeks to induce him to sell his invention to Japan. Winthrop refuses to sell to any government but his own, but the patriotic Japanese, seeing that money will not tempt Winthrop, notices that his daughter, the beautiful O'Tsuru San, has attracted him, and resolves to secure the plans of the torpedo boat through her agency. The girl agrees to marry Winthrop for the sake of her country, and leaves with him for America.

In America O'Tsura San is kindly greeted by Ned's mother, and the Japanese girl's love for her husband grows stronger day by day; the oath she gave to secure the plans of the torpedo boat for Japan becomes distasteful to her. An agent of the Japanese government enters the household and tells O'Tsuru San that the plans must be secured and turned over to him. After a great struggle she resolves to aid her country, tricks her husband, and turns over the precious document to the agent.

Winthrop discovers his wife's deception and curses her. The girl, broken-hearted, realizes that love for her husband is greater than love for her native country. She pursues the Japanese agent, overtakes him and regains the plans, after a terrible struggle and is rescued just in time by Ned, who realizes for the first time his wife's temptation and the love for him, which was stronger than the oath of O'Tsuru San.

PRINCESS.

ALGY'S AWFUL AUTO (Oct. 31).—Algy had always been contented to ride in street cars and never dreamed of the day that he would own an auto which his neighbors would dub "The Yellow Devil." His sweetheart was to blame for it, however, for she induced Algy to take a number of chances in a raffle gotten up by charity, and unfortunately for Algy, he won the auto.

His first difficulty came when he tried to use the street in front of his house as a garage, but this was one case where the auto filled the bill, for it was small and humble and he could take it into his bedroom. This gave Algy an idea, and being afraid of facing traffic conditions, he learned to be a chauffeur indoors and succeeded fairly well, although he did damage considerable furniture.

Later he took his sweetheart for a ride and had all the troubles of a real automobilist. By this time Algy was pretty well cleaned out of money and when his "yellow deveil" broke down again he was glad to trade it to a rural station agent for two tickets to his home town.

RELIANCE.

THE REAL MOTHER (Oct. 27).—Blanche Earl, a widowed ex-chorus girl, has a baby who, figuratively speaking, stands in her way when she wants to go back on the stage. At the earnest pleading of Margaret Leslie, who has just lost her own baby, Blanche surrenders her child to the other woman. All through little Doris's life Margaret cares for her. She teaches the little one her first prayer and when a chance to marry again comes to Margaret she bravely sends her suitor away because of the child, whom he feels would be in the way.

Blanche becomes a popular musical comedy star and the years pass. Doris, now a pretty seventeen-year-old, sells the flowers from her garden at the big hotel on the hill. David, the neighbor's son, is in love with Doris, but she only laughs at him.

Blanche leaves town for a vacation and goes to stop at the big hotel where Doris sells flowers. The girl sees the beautiful woman, and much impressed hands her a tiny knot of blossoms. Next day Doris finds the actress in the road waiting while the chauffeur fixes the car. The girl brings her home to wait. Then for the first time in many years the two mothers meet.

Blanche wants the child now that she has grown to old to be a bother, and Margaret agrees to let the girl choose for herself. Doris overwhelmed by Blanche's beauty and evident wealth goes with her own mother. In the big city Doris finds herself somewhat alone, for Blanche soon tires of her new toy. The girl refuses to be drawn into the rough games and hilarity, and one night after seeing her mother's guests mocking her "a little Puritan" amid much laughter, she decides to go back to her real mother.

Margaret, when the girl returns, feels no resentment, but welcomes her gladly.

TWO MEN AND A MULE—(Series 2—Oct. 29).—Jake and Steve wake up hungry, as usual. They evolve a brilliant scheme whereby they can procure a fine meal apiece. Jake enters a restaurant, orders a dinner, and just as he is finishing Steve comes along and pages him, calling out "Jake Rockefeller, wanted on the phone." Jake immediately jumps up and the two get out together. Then it is Steve's chance. He also gets a fine meal, but his page falls asleep outside the cafe and does not put in an appearance. The head waiter discovers that Steve is an impostor and flings him into the street. From the restaurant they walk down the street and get a position with a piano factory. They are given a heavy piano and after all sorts of difficulties they arrive at their destination. They have various mishaps trying to get the instrument set up in the right place. Finally it is discovered that the wrong one has seen sent and Jake and Steve have to carry it back. Outside the house they meet their nemesis, the mule, who chases them, destroying the piano

THE COLONEL'S OATH (Nov. 1).—Dick Langley marries a pretty Northern girl. Major Langley, a stern Confederate veteran, still bitter against the North, vows that Dick nor any of his blood shall never enter his father's house again. Edith, also proud, and hurt at her father-in-law's injustice, registers the same vow. After a few years Dick dies, leaving his wife and little daughter to struggle for existence. Through her former friend in Dick's home town, Edith secures a position in the school. Runa and her dog is left in charge of the friend. The Colonel stern, ill-tempered and gouty, is sitting in his garden. The dog comes through the hedge, rubbing against his gouty foot. The Colonel is furious and raises his cane to strike the dog. Runa comes after her dog and receives the blow intended for the dog. She is angry and expresses her opinion of the bad old man. The Colonel used to obedience and terror is astounded. He is unable to rid himself of the childish vision and accordingly has his chair moved near the hedge so he can see Runa at play. At last he sends his servant in to bring her back to him. Runa refuses to go, but sends back a note to him saying that her mother does not allow her to associate with bad old folks. Colonel nearly has apoplexy at this, and is more determined than ever to have Runa come in and see him. He then sends a note to her and asks her to come and teach him to be good. She considers a moment and then consents. Her mother returning from school sees her about to enter the house with the Colonel and rushes after her child and reminds the Colonel of his oath and then exits angrily with the child. The Colonel has become greatly attached to the child and gets an idea. He sends for his lawyer and deeds the mansion and grounds to his grandchild. Sends note to Edith asking her forgiveness and saying that he is now dependent on her child. Edith hesitates, realizes that the old man has changed, leaves the decision to Runa, who decides that they be friends. Life is thereby changed and made easier for all persons concerned.

FROM OUT THE STORM (2 parts—Oct. 29).—Grace Adams, a reformed crook, who has married John Adams, a young rancher, is brought to the realization of her past life by receiving a letter from Rusty Hogan, her pal, who has escaped from prison. Her thoughts wander over her past, which are shown by a dissolving effect. She makes up her mind she will not see Hogan. Hogan lands in the town near where Grace is living and is arrested on suspicion; he makes his escape with a lot of gold and wounds the sheriff. A terrific storm is raging when Grace hears a knock at the door. She opens it only to find that the stranger asking admittance is Hogan. He tells her of his big "haul" and entreats her to go away with him. She, being tired of the lonely life on the ranch, is easily persuaded and she leaves with Hogan. They hear a cry for help and going to an old prospect hole nearby they find it is Grace's husband, who has fallen during the storm. Hogan tries to get her to leave the man, but her better nature comes to the front and she insists that Hogan bring the man up out of the shaft. They take Adams to the house and Hogan goes to town to get a doctor. Hogan is attacked by the Indians who have left the reservation and are on the warpath. He returns to the ranch house and during the fight that follows is killed. Grace and Adams are reunited, without Adams knowing that she had intended leaving him.

THE VETERAN (2 parts—Nov. 5).—Amos Hood, an aged veteran of the Civil War, and his wife, Martha, who is an invalid, find themselves in straitened circumstances on account of the old man's pension being held up because of a slight legal error. Amos tries to find work, but is unsuccessful on account of his age. Mrs. Walsh, a kind neighbor, informs two society ladies who call, but the old couple refuse charity. Mrs. Walsh then pretends to have an anniversary dinner and invites them. Company B decides to give a banquet for the purpose of presenting to one of the members a slight token in appreciation of a brave act executed on the battlefield of Gettysburg. Jasper Hutch is an old friend of Amos Hood and both are members of Company B. Both attend the banquet and Amos is seen by Jasper smuggling food to take home to his wife. After the banquet Amos is presented with a medal for his bravery in rescuing Jasper during the war. After Amos has left the others take up a collection for the old man and with a band go to the house. In the meantime Amos finds Martha dead on his arrival. Mrs, Walsh is present when the boys with the band arrive. She rushes out to stop the music and informs them of Martha's death.

KAY-BEE.

AN INDIAN'S HONOR (Nov. 7).—On the Fourth of July, Black Pete drinks too much and the cowboys, trying to rouse him from his lethargy tie a bunch of firecrackers to his coat tails and set them off. He starts shooting up the place and rushes out of the saloon, where he sees Tall Pine, a handsome young Indian. He tries to make him dance, but Tall Pine is not so inclined and a struggle takes place, in which the Indian kills Black Pete. The sheriff is notified and he informs the colonel at a neighboring fort. With a company of soldiers the sheriff and the colonel ride to the Indian village and demand Tall Pine.

Finally Tall Pine, in order to carry out some Indian customs, promises to come to the settlement at dawn. The sheriff is rather skeptical, but the colonel manifests a great amount of faith in Tall Pine. The next morning while Tall Pine is on a high cliff bidding goodbye to earth he notices far below him, Cyril, the colonel's son, who has disobeyed his father's commands and left camp to hunt, being pursued by a couple of bears. With peril to his own life, Tall Pine rescues the boy and carries him unconscious to the fort, where the sheriff is awaiting him, and on account of the lateness of day, thinks that Tall Pine has broken his promise and escaped. All are surprised to see Tall Pine bringing in the boy, and at the suggestion of the sheriff and the pleading of the boy, Tall Pine is allowed to go free.

On the way, however, the young wife pays a visit to a girl friend, who is about to be married. She picks a magazine from the table and in it is a note from the ardent swain of her friend. Mrs. Newlywed borrows a raincoat and upon her reutrn home her husband finds the note in the magazine making an appointment for the same evening. The husband follows the wife and sees her enter the home of her girl friend. The latter emerges with her sweetheart and hubby is on the trail. When Mrs. Newlywed is congratulating Doris and Jack upon their engagement, Newlywed breaks in upon the scene and is about to make trouble when matters are explained to him.

GAUMONT.

THE VENOM INSTITUTE OF SAO PAULO (Oct. 16).—There is an institute at Sao Paulo, Brazil, which does much valuable work in suppressing the fatal effects which often arise when a person or animal is struck by a snake. In view of the fact that Brazil is the home of many snakes whose poison is dangerous, it will be interesting to observe what measures are taken to secure protection from them. A party of men are seen exploring among the thick grass, the particularly venomous kinds of serpent being deftly caught by means of a "snake catcher." On arriving at the institute they are classified according to their species, afterward being placed in gardens surrounded with water and smooth walls to prevent their escape. The extraction of the poison takes place under the direction of a doctor, each serpent yielding about 30 centigrams of fluid. Now, bearing in mind that horses and mules are very liable to be struck, it is a peculiar circumstance that they are also the best subjects for treatment by injection. Consequently, when the animals are inoculated with the diluted poison extracted from the snake, they are practically free from the fatal effect which would otherwise follow, subsequently struck. The serum of such animals is also valuable as a remedy for snake-bite in the case of persons, and for vaccination. Apart from its great interest, the present film will have a considerable educational value.

THE ACCUSING EYES (Oct. 28).—Writing to an old friend, Ralph Ferrard intimated that things were going well. He was engaged to Flossie Kettle, whose father would give them a villa as a wedding gift. F. W. Kettle, a rich collector, was entertaining a party at his house, and among the guests was Jack Roberts, an old sweetheart of Flossie. The presence of this guest made Ferrard uneasy, but he hoped for the best.

Ferrard's anxiety to marry a rich wife was made plain when Messrs. Levi, Patten & Co. wrote demanding a first installment of $25,000 in reduction of a debt for which he was indebted to a financial firm. They believed that the date of his wedding was uncertain, and that being so could not wait more than 48 hours for the money demanded.

After lunch Mr. Kettle invited his guests into the treasure chamber to inspect the many articles. One of the glass cases contained a casket of uncut gems worth a fortune. Ferrard wanted ready money. After the guests had left he vainly endeavored to force the case. It resisted all his efforts and in desperation he smashed the glass top. Alarmed at the noise made by the breaking glass he looked toward the door and saw two eyes peering at him through the keyhole.

Nemesis with outstretched hand was pursuing him though he knew it not. Julia had been thinking things over and meeting her brother Jack, half affrighted, said, "I've seen a robber!" She heard a noise in the treasure chamber and taking a footstool peeped through the little trap and saw a man standing over the broken case. If Jack would go with her she would point him out. Having no suspicion that the unsuccessful robber was the accepted husband of his old sweetheart, Jack went with his little sister to the salon where, having told the host what she had seen, pointed Ferrard as being the man.

Kettle at first declined to believe the story, but finding that the top of the case had been smashed as Julia had described decided to confront him. The little girl led Ferrard out of the salon and told him what she had seen. Alarmed that he had been recognized he realized that the end was near. The host, his fiancee, and many of the house party surrounded him before he could move from the room. Calling the men servants Kettle ordered them not to leave Ferrard until he was out of the grounds. The story ends with the approaching marriage of Flossie and Jack.

MEXICAN PEARL SMUGGLERS (Oct. 30).—Count Alvarez had been carrying on an extensive business in the smuggling of pearls on the Mexican coast by means of carrier pigeons.

He made a personal visit to California with Carmelia, his fiancee, and was introduced to Capt. Henderson's wife and her daughter, Maude. Maude became infatuated with the count, which roused the jealousy of her lover, John Wilson, the U. S. Customs Inspector.

Suspicion fell upon the count and the motive of his visit. John Wilson had the good fortune to shoot one of the carrier pigeons which was conveying the pearls and a cipher message.

Following the information thus secured chase was given to the count and his gang of smugglers and after a very exciting time they were arrested and Wilson and Maude once more became lovers.

MABEL FEIGNS INDISPOSITION (Oct. 31).—Mabel is tired and does not feel disposed to go up to the office; she therefore writes the manager and tells him that she is suffering from a severe attack of influenza; the manager of the firm instructs a doctor to call. The doctor calls and sees through Mabel's deception. He sends her to the hospital. There poor Mabel is handled in such a manner that she is only too glad to go back to work again.

PERCY'S HEROISM (Oct. 31).—Percy and Will court a fair maid and hence become rivals. Whilst Percy adopts highly romantic methods, Will scorns sentiment and woos in a very modest manner. The romantic bearing of Percival appeals to the maiden and he wins a high place in her favor. His avowal of undying affection, backed up by the tales of his daring deeds, overcome the unromantic methods of Will, and the battle is almost won. However, Will succeeds in persuading the fair maid to put Percy to the test. The result is an awful collapse in the heroism of the gallent Percy.

THE TWO SPIES (Feature Subject—2 parts).—When the story opens, Constantinople is slumbering in the peace of an Eastern twilight. Daily the Balkans are drifting nearer, but with the strange fatalism of the East, that sublime indifference to fate which brought the Ottoman Turks to Europe in 1358, the Turks allowed the future to take care of itself. Bulgaria declared wat on October 16, 1912, and even then Constantinople scarcely realized what it portended. The white ships of the Bosphorous gave place to ships of war and transports. Every man was for his native land. Along the borders of the Allied States the troops were massing and Turkey was bestirring herself. The infidel, without doubt, would be driven back to his lair. On all sides men, young and old, were being called to the colors.

At Tchorlou, Nisson bids good-bye to his sweetheart. Boris, inspired by the hope of conquest and redressing the wrongs of hundreds of years, kisses Marfa farewell and goes gaily away with his companions.

Scene follows scene as the men of each nation move slowly forward to the edge of battle. Artillerymen push and drag their guns into position, infantry rush positions, while the cavalry keep a watchful eye on the movements of the enemy. With that dash which enabled them to win victory after victory, ten days after the opening of our story the Bulgarians entered Tchorlou. Their arrival causes the flight of Meriem and her mother. A determined attack is being made on the Turkish positions, and we are enabled to watch the deploying of the troops and the havoc caused by the bursting shells.

THE HOUSE OF QUALITY

Missions are given Boris and Nissim The Bulgarians have learned that a train load of ammunition is on the way to the front, and Boris is entrusted with the task of blowing up the convoy. The Turkish general is uneasy concerning the movements of the Eastern army of the enemy threatening Tchataldja, and Nissim's instructions are to locate the position and determine if the advanced works can be undermined.

The path of the two spies are shortly to cross. Nissim witnessing the attack on Tchorlou, is enabled to form an idea of the strength of the enemy, and having successfully accomplished his mission, begins his return to headquarters. The task assigned Boris is much more hazardous. Locating the little station at which the ammunition is being loaded, he escapes detection by the merest chance, and eventually succeeds in boarding the convoy. While the train is pushing its way towards the army, Boris clambers along the roofs and sets fire to the leading vans. A lurid gleam lights up the sky as one after the other the vans are destroyed by the exploding ammunition. Boris escapes by jumping clear as the first coach fires.

Returning to camp he is surprised by Nissim, and a long and exciting chase on horseback ensues Each is wounded and when Boris sees ahead of him the shelter of a house his strength has almost fled As fate would have it, this is the very house in which Meriem took refuge when she fled from Tchorlou. In the delirium of his dying moments Boris imagines he sees Marfa. To him Meriem, the sweetheart of Nissim, has become the Bulgarian girl, and taking pity on the dying man, she consents to kiss him and let him retain the illusion that she is Marfa.

Just as Boris dies, Nissim, seriously wounded, staggers into the room. He refuses to accept his sweetheart's explanation of the kiss. Mad with jealousy he leaves the house and surrenders to the Bulgarians, who shoot him as a spy, as a battalion of his comrades, conquered and captured, pass along the dusty road.

THE GAMBLER'S RUIN (Feature subject—2 parts).—Peter Thurston enters upon married life, but soon a mania for gambling seizes him, and gradually he sinks lower and lower until he is ruined. The inevitable result is a separation from his wife and failing to obtain money either from her or his father, Peter becomes a burglar. Some time after, he breaks into his wife's apartments and the shock causes the woman's death. Meantime, his father has perfected a machine capable of giving great aid in the detection of criminals and this is applied to Peter, who has been arrested His guilt is proved, but as he is led away, father and son recognize each other.

KINETO.

THE GIRL OF THE SUNNY SOUTH (Feature Subject).—Two young scions of Southern aristocracy are rivals for the hand of Miss Grace Merridew, the belle of the village, who finally succumbs to the advances of Harry Searelle, to the chagrin of Raymond Webster, a promising young attorney. Gustave Le Roy, his confidential clerk, is cognizant of his master's feelings toward Searelle, and decides to play a little game of waiting and watching. About this time the war breaks out and as fate decrees, Searelle is thrown into the power of his secret enemy, Colonel Raymond Webster, as Captain in that superior's regiment. Le Roy is also under the same command. Under the guise of friendship, Col. Raymond promises Grace that he will keep a watchful eye for the safety of her husband.

Grace and her father with Mose, their faithful old servant, are left in charge of the plantation. On the firing line Raymond intercepts a letter from Grace's father, and with the assistance of Le Roy, who is an expert penman, forges a letter which indicates Grace has met with a fatal accident and begs Searelle to return home, if only for a few minutes. A battle is imminent and Raymond has arranged matters to prove that Searelle has deserted in the face of the enemy. His absence at a critical moment causes an examination of his tent, and Searelle is arrested on his way to his home. He is court-martialed and sentenced to be shot at daybreak. The next morning the Federal outposts advance on the fort of the Confederates and capture the fort.

Searelle is found among the wounded and dead. The surgeon finds only a superficial wound, which has caused a complete loss of memory. In the hospital and then in the prison and until the close of war, Searelle is an unknown, nameless man without a past. Grace, who has heard of his death, reverses his memory.

When Raymond returns from the war, he resumes his old advances toward Grace, and asks her to become his wife; she refuses. Things have been going bad on the old plantation, and Raymond advances money on it and secures a mortgage on the property. Searelle, now a tramp, wanders back to his old home and saves Grace from the insults of Raymond, whose evil nature comes to the surface at Grace's persistent refusal of marriage. Raymond determines to foreclose the mortgage, but is thwarted for the moment by the sale of the cotton on the old plantation. The money is in the safekeeping of Grace's father. Raymond, with the assistance of Le Roy, determines to rob the old man and turn them out of their home. Searelle, who is unknown to all, is sleeping in the house when the robbery takes place. In the struggle for the money, the old man is killed and Searelle in trying to detain the robbers, is stunned by the pistol of Le Roy. When he comes to his senses he is arrested as the murderer and is sentenced for life. Le Roy, upon whom the stolen money is found, is convicted as his accomplice, but as Raymond promises him his freedom, he remains silent. Le Roy manages to make his escape from the prison and Searelle goes with him. They take refuge on an outward bound steamer. While they are stowaways in the hold, Le Roy by accident sets the ship on fire. The vessel burns and the boilers explode. After many privations, they are picked up by a tramp steamer bound for home

Le Roy discovers that Raymond attempted his life in the prison, and overcome with Searelle's bravery in saving him from the wreck, he makes up his mind to tell the truth. The terrible privations Searelle underwent produces brain fever, and recovery brings back with it his lost memory.

They return home, Raymond is denounced to the authorities by Le Roy, and in attempting to escape arrest, is killed. Searelle and Grace are re-united, and old Mose rejoices in the return of his dear old master.

FATHER JOHN (Feature Subject—3 parts).—Father John is a rag-picker, well known at the Halles. A good man with many good qualities, he has but one defect: he is fond of the bottle. He is intoxicated when he meets Garousse, a man ruined by gambling and reduced to the humble trade of a rag-picker. He will not listen to Father John's exhortations. As it happens, a collection clerk, Didier, is returning from his round. Garousse does not recoil from murdering the man and make off with the money. It is in vain that John tries to interfere; Garousse pushes him off, half strangles him and runs away. In front of Didier's body, John swears to keep away from drink forever, and takes home with him, Marie Didier, the grandchild of the victim.

Fifteen years later, Father John lives a happy life with Marie, now a dressmaker. Garousse, by means of the stolen money, has become the Baron Hoffman. He has a daughter whom he wishes to wed to Henry Berville, his partner's son. Claire Hoffman has a child from some illicit love, and she has him brought up secretly.

By chance, Henry Berville, while out for a walk, comes across Marie Didier, giving alms to poor women. Baron Hoffman is informed by a telegram that he is a ruined man. He informs his daughter of the disaster and she declares she will do all she can to save him. Unfortunately, Henry Berville does not love Claire. Baron Hoffman is soon satisfied as to the reason of his refusal when, on Marie Didier being introduced, he notices the tender intimacy that seems to exist between the two young people. He decides to see to it and to put Marie out of the way of Berville.

Baron Hoffman secures the assistance of Mme. Patard, a midwife, and orders, in return for 10,000 francs, the disappearance of the child; but Mme. Patard prefers to hand over the child to Marie Didier, in whose kindness she has confidence. Marie not being at home, Mme. Patard leaves the child in her place. Marie was then at a masked ball, where, insulted by some man, she had been protected by Henry.

When she returns home, she finds the child. It never entered her mind to take it to the Foundling Hospital, and keeps it with her. The same night, Father John finds in his basket, the rolls of bills lost by Patard. Baron Hoffman calls on Marie, whom he has followed after a meeting with Henry, and asks her to give up the young man. Learning that the young girl has a child with her, he seeks information and soon learns, by the coincidents of dates, who it is. He writes to Mme. Patard, stating that he knows he has been duped and that her only chance of pardon lies in the disappearance of the child; 50,000 francs is to be the price of that disappearance. As soon as he is satisfied that the midwife has secured the child, he writes to the magistrate and informs him that Marie Didier has done away with the child, whom, she states, has been stolen from her. Marie is arrested.

On reading the paper, Father John learns of Marie's arrest, and also the name of the person who has lost 10,000 francs in notes. He sees that it is a plot against the girl. He endeavors to find the author of that vengeance, and calls on the midwife. After some prolonged questioning, John gets hold of the facts; he understands the part played by Mme. Patard and knows that the money was paid out by the baron. He calls on him and the two men, without seeming to do so, recognize each other.

Garousse-Hoffman recollects that Father John was formerly fond of drink. Forgetting his oath, Father John gets intoxicated and Garousse steals the papers containing the proof of the crime. This, however, does not deter Father John, and his desire to save Marie is not to be swerved. He finds the means to enlist the sympathy of the magistrate, and, by the aid of a detective, Mme. Patard makes a full confession. She is arrested. Accompanied by two policemen, he repairs to the baron's house, who, by means of stratagem, is made to confess that he really is the murderer of Didier. Marie Didier, upon being set free, weds Henry Berville.

RAMO.

THE CURRENT (Feature—3 parts—Oct. 15).—John Howard, incapable of working the farm on account of heart trouble, is unable to forestall the mortgage foreclosure. His son, a dissipated youth, quarrels with his father and goes to New York. The excitement hastens the father's death and Lois, Will's sister, is left alone and without money.

Madge Lewis, a friend of Lois, now in the theatrical business, persuades her to come to New York, and aids Lois in securing a position in the department store of S. Homer Halsey. Halsey is attracted by Lois' beauty and induces Lois to dine with him, and a private room is selected. Lois' suspicions are realized and after angrily resenting his offered insults, she is told she is no longer required at the store.

Will's course in New York is downward. He visits a cheap gambling house and wins. His luck persuades him to be a frequent visitor at the gambling house. Successful for a time, he leads a riotous life on the proceeds, but his luck turns and the raiding of the gambling house finds him completely down and out and a lounger in the corner saloons.

With Madge's introduction Lois secures a position as chorus girl in a big vaudeville act. Jack Wharton, a friend of the manager, on meeting Lois, falls in love with her. The star is seriously injured and the newspapers, while relating the fact, comment favorably on Lois' performance of the star part. Will, thus learning of Lois' success, asks her for money. One night Lois is called to go on the stage and leaves Will in her dressing-room slightly intoxicated. Will overturns an alcohol lamp; it is the cause of a fire which starts a panic in the audience and incidentally lays him up for weeks.

Jack's father, urged by Jack's sister, Mary, decides to test the character of Lois. As a result, Lois, realizing the difference in their social position and thinking Jack's father objects to her, refuses to see Jack again. Lois, however, not only meets the test but wins the father's complete approbation, and subsequently Jack and Lois are married. Returning from their honeymoon Lois learns of Halsey's engagement to Mary. Halsey, still attracted by Lois' beauty, attempts to flirt. After several rebuffs and a particularly stinging rebuke, he determines to humiliate her.

Will, in trouble again, this time for using money of the firm with which Jack has placed him, comes to Lois. Not wishing to see Jack, he hides in Lois' closet as he enters the room. Upon their leaving the room Halsey sneaks in and conceals a necklace of Mary's which he has obtained, in Lois' dresser. Its loss immediately being discovered, Halsey easily turns suspicion on Lois. Will, from the closet, however, seeing Halsey act and divining his base motive, takes the necklace and realizing that his word would not be sufficient to clear his sister, cleverly causes the necklace to be found in Halsey's possession. Discomfited and confused, Halsey is discredited and dismissed from the house, leaving Lois still in possession of the love and trust of her husband and her new friends. The spark of manhood has been kindled in Will.

AT THE WHEEL (Feature Subject—3 parts).—Kitty Bey, a dashing young woman, is the cause of all the trouble. She thinks she loves Miller, the first officer of the Nina, and with the consent of the owners of the vessel accompanies him on one of the trips. While on board Kitty attracts the attention of the captain, and she loses no time in playing her arts upon him. Old Graves, the boatswain, is a man with an eagle eye and when he locates Kitty in the captain's cabin, Miller is notified and there is a sensational scene, in which the first officer attempts to shoot his fiancee and his commanding officer. Miller is placed under arrest and upon arrival at the nearest port is sentenced to a long term.

In the meantime Kitty Bey has married Captain Fisher and all goes well until she is introduced to Henry Brandt, the shipowner. Her arts of witchery again come to the surface and she accompanies the shipowner on board a launch moored to the wharf in the rear of Captain Fisher's residence. Boatswain Graves is on the job again and notifies Miller, who has just been released from imprisonment. The latter boards the launch without attracting attention and turning on the power, heads out for sea. When the couple emerge from the cabin they are confronted by Miller, with one hand on the wheel and the other holding a revolver. He has removed the plugs from the bottom of the craft and she is slowly filling with water. It is not the life of Brandt that he is after, but that of the faithless Kitty. The shipowner, however, is doomed to share the general fate and the three sink into the deep just as the launch containing Captain Fisher and his friends reach the spot tells the girl that unless she abandons every relationship with his son, he will completely disinherit him. That night the servant overhears a heated altercation between father and son and the next morning the professor is found dead with a bullet wound in his side. Kate Kirby, the girl detective, is engaged. All the arts of modern criminal detection and many unique methods are introduced, which, however, prove futile. Miss Kirby finds a carbon sheet, the impression on which is a letter from the professor to the chorus girl, asking her to call after the performance, as he wishes "to settle." Miss Kirby then discovers a drop of blood leading to the observatory, where other disclosures prove the professor was shot. A notebook and other effects found in the professor's pockets indicate that he had been engaged in an experiment until an hour before dawn, which stamps the time of his death. The son is arrested on the strength of the double motive. Following the clue disclosed by the carbon, Miss Kirby secures a position in "The Red Rose Company" and becomes intimate with Violet Dane in an effort to gain her confidence. The son is subjected to a gruelling third degree, and collapses under the ordeal. These facts are graphically told in the evening paper, which Miss Kirby reads in an intensely dramatic manner to Violet Dane, in the hope that she will admit her guilt. Later Miss Kirby overhears her praying for the fate of Richard so earnestly as to force the conclusion upon Miss Kirby that she is innocent. But Miss Kirby receives one of the shocks of her life when she receives a telegram from police headquarters advising her that Miss Dane has confessed to the murder. Miss Kirby, suspecting Miss Dane's motive, cross-examines the girl, who adheres to her confession. The boy is released in Miss Dane's presence. It is the first time that the two have met since the professor's death, and the meeting, tragic in the extreme, is even heightened when the boy hears the confession and recoils in horror, renouncing his sweetheart. The girl, with stoic fortitude, abandons herself to her fate. Miss Kirby examines in the most thorough fashion the effects of the deceased professor, and discovers a note referring to the perfection of a wonderful invention an hour before dawn. A gleam of new hope enters into the case; she enlists the interest of her father, a paralyzed detective, and they discover that the professor was killed by a terrific explosive force (technically known as infra red ray, the discovery of which by Signor Ulivil, the Italian engineer, has so lately startled the scientific world.) Miss Kirby at once apprises the police and the deadly machine demonstrates the manner of the professor's death.

"THE CREAM OF THE EUROPEAN MARKET SELECTED FOR AMERICA"

THE COUNT OF MONTE CRISTO (Feature subject—5 parts).—Edmond Dantes, a young sailor in the service of the Pharaoh, prior to a long voyage, takes leave of his invalid father and his sweetheart, Mercedes. The tender farewell with Mercedes arouses the jealous hatred of Fernand, a Catalan fisherman, secretly in love with Mercedes. Dantes gives Mercedes a brooch (which later again figures in the story) and sails away. In mid-sea the captain of the Pharaoh suddenly dies and intrusts Dantes with a private letter from General Murat to the exiled emperor, Napoleon Bonaparte, at Elba. Danglars, the supercargo, overhears the captain's dying request, and keeps the knowledge in the event of future need. When the vessel touchs Elba, Dantes delivers the letter to the deposed emperor, and promises to deliver Napoleon's reply to Noirtier, of the Bonaparte Committee. In Dantes' absence Fernand urges his hopeless suit of Mercedes. On the return of the Pharaoh, Morell, its owner, makes Dantes captain of the vessel, a post which Danglars had hoped to secure. After an attempt to murder Dantes, which is frustrated by Mercedes, Fernand and Danglars discover their common enmity of Dantes and plot his ruin.

Fernand and Danglars write an anonymous letter to Villefort, King's Attorney, accusing Dantes of delivering contraband communications between Napoleon and his lieutenants, insinuating that such a dispatch may be found in the office of the Pharaoh. Villefort examines Dantes and releases him pending the discovery of the letter. The marriage of Dantes and Mercedes is performed simultaneously with the discovery of the guilty communication. To save his half-brother Noirtier, of the Bonaparte Committee, to whom the letter from the exiled emperor is addressed, Villefort causes Dantes to be apprehended at his wedding feast and imprisoned in the Chateau D'If. Deprived of his son's support, Dantes' father dies of starvation. Mercedes, believing Dantes dead, and for the sake of her fatherless child, Albert, promises to marry Fernand on his return from the war. Meanwhile, with a lone but supreme hope, with marvelous patience and persistence, Dantes works to cut a tunnel through the stone wall to liberty.

While Dantes struggles on in his cell, with his single but omniscient hope of freedom as the only spark of cheer in the surrounding despair, with a bitter suggestion of irony, the picture flashes a glimpse of Mercedes, her son, Albert, and Fernand, now a colonel. The Abbe Faria, another prisoner in the Chateau who in spite of the frailty of age, had for years been cutting a path to possible liberty, struggles on unremittingly, while Dantes from the opposite side continues his similar labor. After years of weary toil they meet in the tunnel, finding instead of liberty only each other and hopelessness. In France Danglars is now a wealthy banker, and the creditor of his former emplayer, Morell. At last the years of confinement and denial claim the spent body of the Abbe and he dies, giving to Dantes the half-burnt letter of Cardinal Spada, describing the location of treasures secreted on the Isle of Monte Cristo. In a gamble with death, Dantes takes the Abbe's place in the burial sack, which is cast into the sea. Dantes comes to the surface and attains the refuge of a huge rock, from the summit of which he drinks in his liberty, and exclaims from an unleashed soul, "The World is Mine!" He is rescued by the smuggler ship La Amelia, and turns his eyes and hopes toward Monte Cristo, the grave of the buried treasure.

At the Isle of Monte Cristo, Dantes escapes from the smuggler ship and finds the hidden treasures of the Spadas. Fabulously wealthy, with all the world before him, he determines to find his friends and detect his enemies, to punish the evil and reward the good. Disguised as the Abbe Busoni he returns to France and learns of his father's death and the plot of Fernand and Danglars. He arranges a meeting with Noirtier at the inn, who comes disguised as a pedler. Villefort, obtaining a suggestion of the Abbe's identity, follows Noirtier, and after a futile attempt to murder his half-brother, driven to despair at the threatened exposure of his villainy, commits suicide. It is then that Dantes, in the knowledge of his power and the thrill of retribution, exclaims "One!" signifying that one of his enemies had met the fate his criminality deserved.

Dantes, in the guise of the Count of Monte Cristo, presents a letter of credit to Danglars, and meets his old benefactor, Morell, who is facing financial ruin and seeks monetary aid from Danglars. He assists Morell anonymously and quietly passes on to his other rewards and penalties. Dantes instigates the publication of a newspaper article to the effect that information given by Haydee, daughter of Fernand's late benefactor, now the ward of Monte Cristo, proves that Comte de Mercerf, formerly Fernand, was guilty of treachery to and the murder of his benefactor. Identified as the Count of Monte Cristo, a ball is given in Dantes' honor by Mercedes and Fernand. Monte Cristo recognizes Mercedes by the brooch he had given her in the long ago. Albert accuses Danglars, whose daughter is his fiancee, of responsibility for the article condemning Fernand, whom he believes to be his father. When later he ascertains the truth he challenges Monte Cristo to a duel. Mercedes, who becomes aware of the challenge informs Dantes that Albert is his son. On the duelling ground Dantes proclaims his identity, and Fernand, overwhelmed by the recognition, and fearful of the avenging Nemesis, withdraws into the woods, whence a moment later comes the report of a shot. Dantes announces "Two!" and challenges Danglars, thrusting his rapier into the heart of his last surviving enemy. With the relentless fury of vengeance incarnate, Dantes pronounces "Three!" wiping out the year's debt of treachery and torture. Turning to Mercedes he takes her in his arms; and Mercedes explains all the sad happy mystery to the wondering boy when she says, "Albert, embrace your father!"

THE BEGGAR'S SECRET (Feature Subject—3 parts.—When Cortay, a man who has been leading a riotous life, married, he abandons his passion for such an existence and spends all his time with his wife. He leads a happy domestic life until the birth of his daughter, Collette, when the passion for the abandoned life revives itself. After spending his fortune he begins to drain that belonging to his wife. Notwithstanding the fact that he has deserted her she still loves him.

More troubles soon come to the wife, and as she is promenading one day, her little daughter is kidnapped by Bohemians, who bring the child to South America, where in years she becomes a wild woman. Abhorring the life she is living, she flees. Her escape is soon discovered by the Bohemians, who go in search of her. Just as they are about to seize her, a number of young men come to her rescue and rout the assailants. One of the young men, Jean Darty, takes her in his care and gives her his home while he goes to stay with friends. It is not long afterward that he asks her to marry him, but she will give him no decided answer. During one of their walks they come upon a blind priest named Father Anthony, whom they befriend.

At a charity bazaar to which Jean has brought Collette she meets the Count d'Antrerives, a wealthy young engineer, who falls deeply in love with her. Having only a sisterly affection for Jean, she promises, after a brief acquaintanceship, to marry the count. Shortly before their marriage the count is called away to a distant land to settle some family matters, but is killed on the way. Almost reduced to poverty she is obliged to take a little furnished room. Weak from hunger and sickness she falls to the floor in a heap. Neighbors hearing the noise, come to her and Father Anthony calls a physician who orders her to a hospital.

During all these years, Collette's mother, Mme. Cortay, has become a successful seamstress and charity worker. In visiting the wards of the different hospitals she comes upon Collette (whom she does not recognize) and offers her a position in one of her shops when she has convalesced. During her convalescent period, Collette wins the friendship of one of Mme. Cortay's employees and she acquaints her with the fact that the medallion around her neck was given her when a baby by her mother, whom she has not seen since she had been kidnapped. As soon as Collette is well enough to leavè the hospital she goes to the kind woman who had offered her employment, and is given it. Shortly after her installment in Mme. Cortay's shops, Collette notices that she has lost the medallion. Mme. Cortay makes a search, and it is found around the neck of one of her help. Mme. Cortay recognizes the medallion and mother and daughter are brought together for the first time in many years. Longing to have her old friend, Father Anthony, near her, Collette goes to him only to find him in conversation with Jean Darty. Remorse overtakes Collette and she gives her hand to Jean, whose love has always been true to her. Collette brings Father Anthony to her home and her mother recognizes in the blind priest her long lost husband. Although her heart has become rather adamant in the years of separation her sympathetic nature rises and she becomes reconciled to her husband. Jean Darty's recompensation is Collette's hand in marriage.

PHANTOM DUNGEON (Feature subject—2 parts). —Raymond de Beauxvflle is engaged to the daughter of banker Stern. A reverse of fortune ruins Raymond. Mr. Stern, being a practical man, finds it necessary to set Raymond free. Raymond leaves without regret. He did not love, but simply a social arrangement. He is discouraged and seeks to end his life. Before taking the fatal step, he recalls his past life; goes to sleep and dreams memories. In his dream, he sees the castle of his ancestors and the secret vault, also two lords who come to hide the fortune of the family which was never found. Raymond awakes suddenly and finds himself imbued with new energy.

He prepares to visit the country of Baux and to reassure himself as to the reality of the treasure he procures all possible information relating to that country and immediately begins his researches. He visits the quarries on the Baux property. The castle of his ancestors is a total wreck, nothing but the site of towers and the dungeon remain. Little familiar with the locality, Raymond slips and injures himself. A young beggar girl, Clara, who lives with her father in the quarries, helps him. She brings her father and they take Raymond to their home. During his convalescing, Raymond explains why he came and his strange dream. Clara while walking with Raymond reveals to him an unknown cave reached by an underground passage. She helps him and the quarry men watch their movements and are jealous of Raymond's attentions to Clara. As soon as the cave is revealed to Raymond, he alone tries to find the treasure. Clara is questioned by the quarry men, who try to torture her to reveal what she knows. She refuses and they decide to entomb Raymond alive in the dungeon. Clara hears everything and she reaches the cave, when she finds they have built a stone wall at the opening. She is giving way to despair when she discovers a dynamite cartridge of frequent use in the quarry. She uses it to blow up the part of cave where Raymond is shut in. A miraculous way is opened and she finds Raymond dying. The quarry men run to keep clear of the explosion. Raymond is saved, gains possession of the "Treasure of Baux" and returns to Paris with Clara as a bride.

Mr. Stern learns that Raymond has come in possession of a large fortune, rushes to congratulate him and Raymond presents his bride as the real "Treasure of Baux," much to the disappointment of banker Stern.

THE GYPSY'S KISS (Feature subject—2 parts).—Marinka is the queen of a Romany tribe. With her people she camps on the estate of the wealthy Count Paul. The latter is struck by her beauty. He asks for the flowers she wears, and is told that if he wants them he must come and get them. On horseback they race through the forest groves. When he overtakes her and reaches for the flowers she bites him severely on the hand.

Piqued and enraged, the count demands of the gypsies that she be made to apologize or else they will be expelled from his grounds. Coerced by necessity, Marinka with several of her band comes to the count's castle and none too graciously apologizes. The count chaffs her upon being afraid to come alone, whereupon she defiantly says she will return unaccompanied when the count's companions have gone. This she does. The count's ingratiating manners win the gypsy's wild heart. He struggles for a kiss. She is about to yield to this wish when she remembers the prophecy concerning her, that "whom shall first fiss Marinka, the unkissed, shall die before sunset and that upon her people shall come malediction and desolation." Outside is watching Baschir, a gypsy admirer, who, madly jealous, runs away to the tribe and tells that Marinka has delivered them unto the penalty of the fateful kiss.

When the queen comes from the count's mansion she is seized by the gypsies and hurried away to imprisonment. She is condemned to death by burning at the stake. In the morning from his tower the count and his companions about to go hunting see the gypsy caravan hurrying across the fields. Wondering at this sudden departure, the count upon them trains his powerful field glasses. As his eyes rove the distant fields he sees Marinka tied to a post, and Baschir, torch in hand, pressing his profane lips upon the fated ones of Marinka of the prophecy. Dashing to their horses the count and his party gallop to the scene in time to save Marinka from the cruel forks of flame which all about her are stabbing redly. Her lips freed from the awful curse, the queen yields them to Paul in gratitude and love. Meanwhile the gypsies, to cut off pursuit, are destroying the bridges behind them. As Baschir wields his axe on the last planking his foot slips, and with the debris of the wrecked bridge he slips into the water to his death.

ANNOUNCEMENT

We are now printing the word "Eastman" on the margin of all our Cine film. We want the exhibitor to know when he is and when he is not getting Eastman film. It will be to his advantage—and ours.

Of course it will take time for such identifiable films to reach the consumer—so don't expect results at once—but it's a step in the right direction—for your interests and ours.

FILM RELEASES OF AMERICA.

THE FIREFLY (Feature—4 parts).—Lilian, little daughter of Countess Barri, and Ralph, son of the estate manager, are playing in the groves when Michael, a wandering gypsy, comes upon them. The antics of his monkey amuse the children. They beg the Countess to accompany them to the gypsy camp to see Michael's other pets.

The Countess, angered when the gypsy's wife abuses her sick child, orders the wayfarers from her grounds. At dawn Lilian, thinking of the fascinating monkey, climbs from her crib and runs to the camp. The gypsies abduct her, purposing to have her take the place of their own chick who has died in the night. In the morning sturdy little Ralph bravely comforts the bereaved mother and volunteers to find the missing child. He overtakes the gypsies. Ineffectually the children attempt to get back home. They are overtaken and brought back to a cruel beating. Years pass. The gypsies have been far abroad and Ralph has been unable to restore Lilian to her mother. Now that they are near their own hearthstone, Ralph quarrels with Michael and goes away after learning that Lilian, who has become a "star" performer, has been engaged to do a beautiful "Firefly" act with a circus. Lilian is a big success. Her beauty attracts an old Baron, with whom, coincidentally, Ralph has obtained a place as chauffeur. Michael "sells" Lilian to the Baron. The latter takes her out in his automobile. The Baron attempts to kiss Lilian. Ralph pretends that something has gone wrong with the automobile. When the Baron alights to investigate Ralph starts the machine, leaving the Baron in the lurch. Michael, knowing that Ralph will take Lilian to the home from which she had been stolen, proceeds after them with murder in his heart.

He comes upon the overjoyed mother and daughter accompanied by Ralph at the top of an old tower in which the children played years before. Michael locks them in and lights the fuse of an infernal machine, which he places in a lower window of the tower. Ralph sees the dastardly deed and strives to open the locked door. Only one way is left. Climbing out upon old telegraph wires which pass over a pond, he makes the perilous passage and drops, unhurt, into the water. The terrified watchers see him reach the infernal machine just a moment before its fuse ignites with the dynamite. Ralph throws it from him blindly. It falls into the bushes, wherein Michael has hidden himself. Michael is killed by his own petard.

THE VOICE OF THE WILD (Feature—2 parts).—A baby's cry startles Farmer Wilson as he trudges through the snow of the forest. He finds a lusty infant girl lying by the side of her mother, dead and chill under the shroud of the fleecy white.

Sixteen years later, the baby foundling, Alraune, is a member of Wilson's family. Her fondness for Herbert Wilson is not altogether foster-sisterly, and when his cousin Agnes comes to the house to supplant Alraune as nurse to Mrs. Wilson, who is dying, Alraune is angry and jealous.

In the woodland Alraune meets Rigo, member of a gypsy band. Being of the same roving Romany blood, his fervent love-making stirs the wild in her. Trouble is brewing for her, however, as she is seen by Herbert Wilson in company with the gypsy. On Alraune's return to the house she is denounced for her choice of company and is summarily sent to her room.

Romantic Rigo comes a-wooing, and when detected on the premises by the Wilsons there is an active chase in which Rigo goes leaping over fences, dives down a well and wrestles with a bull before being caught and imprisoned in a cellar. Alraune, anxious to save her lover and being unable to leave her room by the stairs, descends from her window by means of a twisted sheet.

Deserting her home of many years, the voice of the blood too strong to resist its call. Alraune goes away with Rigo. Alarm is rampant when she is missed and the members of the household, bereaved by the recent death of Mrs. Wilson, go out into the wintry wastes to seek the lost one.

In traversing the mountain passes the elder Wilson falls over a cliff and is killed. Mournfully, his son and members of the forest rangers make a bier from branches of trees, and upon this they lay the cold body.

Meanwhile, Alraune has braved the rigors of the rigid woodlands and attempts to join the gypsies who, fearful of prosecution, have fled. She launches out upon the river on a frail raft. A storm comes up and she is in dire peril when Rigo, seeing her from a distant shore swims to the rescue.

Dramatically, the funeral cortege and the gypsy caravan meet at the forest cross-roads. Alraune, overcome with grief, seeing lifeless her kind old foster-father, her savior from the snows of yesteryear, attempts to embrace Herbert Wilson, her companion in grief.

Angrily he repudiates her, imprecating upon her the maledictions of a sorrow-laden soul. Bitterly, savagely he pushes her away. Inert, shamed, remorseful, she lies upon the snow, hiding her face in the icy crystals. But as passes the slow, measured steps of the carriers of the dead, she hears ringing through the halls of her heart, those murmurs which would not be denied—the voices of the wild. Gypsy she was born -gypsy she must be.

APEX.

LONDON BY NIGHT (Feature—3 parts).—Young Dick Ralston, the heir to Ralston Towers, down from Oxford, is met at the station by Sir John, his father, and Mary, his father's ward. Dick falls a captive to the sweet simplicity of Mary, proposes to her, and is accepted. The betrothal is witnessed by Sir John, who sees his dearest wish realized, for he had always intended that Mary should become the mistress of his old home as Dick's wife. One day Dick receives a letter from a college chum, reminding him of a promise to read in chambers for the bar. Dick acquaints his father and Mary of the promise. They are delighted with Dick's resolve to study for an honorable profession and wish him every success. Next day he leaves for London. For some time Dick reads hard in his chambers at Lincoln's Inn. One evening Jack, his friend, comes in and persuades Dick to leave his books and go for a night out up West. Dick does not take long to make up his mind—he goes with Jack to the Cabaret, where they meet Estelle, an adventuress. Estelle sees in Dick easy prey, unused to the wiles of London sirens. He soon falls an easy victim. Time passes, and Mary at home is troubled by reason of not hearing from her lover. Sir John, noticing the girl's unhappiness, suggests a visit to his son in town. Meanwhile Dick is holding a wine party in his chambers. Sir John and Mary arrive, outside they hear the sounds of drunken revelry. Mary tries to persuade her guardian not to enter, but Sir John takes no heed, opens the door and enters his son's chambers. For a moment he stands still, aghast at the scene before him, while Mary, with a little pitiful cry, covers her face with her hands. The room is filled with men and women, and the air thick with cigarette smoke. Dick is seen with his arms round Estelle. Recovering his composure, Sir John strides forward and demands from Dick an explanation of his conduct. Dick hangs his head and refuses to answer. Mary pitifully adds her entreaties, but Dick can only turn shamefully away. Estelle is amused, she taunts Mary on the loss of her lover and insults Sir John. Sir John, furious, takes the weeping Mary and leads her from the room, disgusted at his son's behavior.

Sir John determines to cut Dick out of his will and leave all his property to his ward. Unconscious of this, Dick is attending a race meeting with Estelle—the horse he has backed heavily meets with an accident, and the young man loses all. Estelle asks for money but is refused. She leaves him in a fury. The behavior of his son has greatly affected Sir John's health, and one day, while out walking with Mary, he has a fatal seizure and dies a few hours later. Then comes the reading of the will. Dick discovers that his father has left all to Mary—he is stunned, while Mary, more than amazed, for she has no idea of the altered will, begs Dick to take back the money, but he, feeling that he has been ill-used, leaves the house in anger. Dick has been disinherited, Estelle has no further use for him and encourages the attention of a certain wealthy stockbroker, who presents her with a diamond necklace. Dick seeks an interview with Estelle and receives his conge. Estelle also instructs her maid to refuse to admit Dick when he calls. Dick goes threatening the woman who has wrecked his life. Now upon the scene comes a thief, Sly Ned. Breaking into Estelle's flat he sees her admiring her diamonds in a mirror. The man's cupidity is immediately roused and he makes a bid for the jewels. Estelle will not give her possession without a fight: in the struggle she is killed. Seizing the necklace the thief makes his escape. Dick determines to make one last appeal to Estelle. Refused admittance, he makes an entrance to the house as did he thief. Then to his horror, he discovers the dead body of Estelle—as he is examining the weapon the maid ushers in Estelle's new lover—Dick is accused of the crime, but makes good his escape. Next morning he reads in a newspaper that a hue and cry is out for him. Frightened at the strength of the evidence against him, he becomes a fugitive.

Mary, refusing to touch any of the money that she thinks belongs to Dick, makes use of a diploma that she has earned, and becomes a hospital nurse. Dick is still a fugitive from the law. Down to the lowest dregs, penniless and homeless, he is resting his tired body on a seat on the Embankment, under the shade of Big Ben, when irony of ironies he is accosted by the man for whose crime he is suffering and asked for a light. Then, Sly Ned, noticing the forlorn appearance of Dick, invites him to accompany him to a doss-house in Limehouse. Thankful of a bed of any sort, Dick agrees. They reach the doss-house and retire to bed. In the doss-house kitchen a fight occurs; during the melee a lamp is smashed—the house soon catches fire, and soon the place is ablaze. A fierce fight occurs amongst the frantic dossers striving to escape from the hungry flames. Sly Ned is struck down. Dick comes across his unconscious body and carries him to a temporary place of safety. Up shoot the flames—great columns of smoke roll in majestic splendor across the starlit sky—crash after crash is heard as one floor after another caves in. The fire brigade is soon on the scene; Dick drags the unconscious Ned to the window and drops him into the blanket held by the firemen, following himself a few seconds later. They are taken to the hospital where Mary has entered as a nurse, and she does not recognise him, blackened and begrimed by smoke. Sly Ned, injured unto death, confesses to the crime, and clears Dick of all suspicion. In the meantime Dick has been washed, having only received injuries of a trifling nature. Mary walks in, and with a cry of joy, rushes at once to his side, but he turns away with shame, saying that he is wanted for murder. Mary at once rushes back to the ward and brings the police officer to show him the signed confession by Sly Ned. Dick clasps Mary in his arms, and she nestling up close to him, prevails him to return to Ralston Towers. Dick consents and at last passes out of the gloom into the sunlight.

PILOT.

ACROSS THE CONTINENT (Feature Subject—4 parts).—John Adderly, a prosperous saloon keeper, prevails upon George Constance to drink. Soon George becomes a confirmed drunkard. His wife, Agnes, parts with everything, even her wedding ring, for food. She goes to Adderly and pleads for bread for her children, Tom and Louise, but is refused. Adderly asks her to drink a toast to his son, John Jr. Raising her glass Agnes gives this toast: "May your unholy wealth drop from your hand as the poison from this glass—may your child live to turn you out to starve—may you curse him as I now curse you—because of my children starving through your greed." Infuriated, the saloon keeper kicks her out. She tries to reach her house, but falls exhausted in the snow. Goodwin comes across her body, and with the aid of a policeman, takes her to her home. George, in a drunken stupor, is asleep on an old mattress on the floor. Agnes tells Goodwin the story of her life. Goodwin promises to care for her little ones. Happy in the knowledge that Tom and Louise will be cared for, Agnes falls back—dead. Goodwin takes the children to his home. George wakes and is horrified at finding his wife dead. Madly he rushes from the room, knocking over the lighted candle, which sets fire to the house. In his tremens George falls from a high bridge to the raging waters below. The fire rages and spreads to the next house—Adderly's. Adderly and his son are rescued from the flames, but Adderly's eyes are injured.

Twenty years later, Adderly, now retired from business, is becoming blind. He is very proud of his son, who, however, does not respect his father. He becomes friendly with two crooks, Jim Grogan and Bill Morgan. Joe Ferris, a wanderer, detects John, Jr., cheating at cards, and exposes him, thereby winning his lasting hatred. Joe falls in love with Louise, now a beautiful young woman. Realising how impossible his suit is, he decides to reform. By a clever scheme of John, Jr., and his pals, Joe is arrested for theft, convicted and sentenced to three years in prison. Adderly, becoming totally blind, is persuaded to turn his money over to his son. John, Jr., then casts his father off, and the old man is reduced to beggary.

In a fight over a dancing girl a stranger is stabbed by Giovanni, the saloon keeper. Johnnie falls in love with Dolores, the dancing girl. Giovanni and his brother, Pablo, do not approve of the match, but are afraid if they interfere Dolores will tell of the murder. Tom becomes engaged to Goodwin's daughter. John, Jr., by investing his father's ill-gotten wealth, becomes a very rich man, and changes his name to Allerton. Allerton meets the Goodwin family, and becomes infatuated with Louise, who does not return his affection. He persuades Tom to gamble. Tom loses heavily and forges his father's name to pay Allerton, who then threatens Tom with exposure unless he help Allerton to win Louise.

Joe escapes from prison, and is sheltered by Dolores and Johnnie. Giovanni attasks Joe in the flat, but is prevented from injuring him by Johnnie. Tom is rescued from footpads by Johnnie, who takes him to his home. Joe is delighted to meet Louise, but the stigma of prison prevents him from asking her to marry him, although she loves him. Bill, dying, makes a confession of how they conspired to send Joe to jail. Tom and Joe trail Allerton to Giovanni's saloon. Giovanni and Allerton see them coming and put out the lights. Pablo enters the saloon first, and is stabbed by his brother, who thinks it is Tom or Joe. Pablo, in a dying rage, discloses his brother's crime. Both Giovanni and Allerton are sent to jail. By a clever ruse Allerton escapes. Meeting his father he forces him to exchange clothes; and then, cursing his son, the old man dies. Goodwin obtains a position for Joe and Johnnie in the West. Joe goes, telling Louise when he has made good he will come back for her. Louise becomes heartsick, and Goodwin takes her and his old colored servant, Caesar, to visit Joe and Johnnie. She is captured by Allerton and is saved from the enraged man by Caesar, who is compelled to shoot Allerton. The shot destroys Allerton's sight. Joe and Louise, and Tom and Clara are wed.

Three "ALIVE" reels of American cowboys and "cowbells" competing for the World's championship in death-defying dangers seen nowhere else on the face of the earth.

The wildest horses are ridden merely to test the strength of the proud cowboy in subduing the vicious, bucking and biting man-killers.

Cowboys wrestle wild steers to prove that, with their bare hands, they can throw the mad animals to the ground. No ordinary person could attempt such feats and escape with his life. You actually see man, horse and steer clash to the ground together, seldom escaping without serious injury.

The public is hungry for something "ALIVE." "They eat it up," and you state right men know it. Grasp your opportunity NOW and get this "ALIVE" feature better than a special.

A great lobby display of 1-3-6 sheet, 5 color lithographs and photos free with each state.

Exhibitors wishing to book this "MINT" will be furnished the name of the party who has their state by writing to us.

THE VITAL QUESTION?—THINK IT OVER

Is Perfect Projection Under Perfect Moral Conditions—Daylight?

Daylight Projection means Mirroroide to the Exhibitor who is anxious to build up his Business which will Endure and Increase Week After Week.

YOU MUST USE

A MIRROROIDE SCREEN OR CURTAIN

It's Essential!—a Necessity! to Your Business. Your Business Depends Upon Your Patronage.

Why we withdrew our advertisements in all trade papers (World excepted)—

Factories Running Night and Day

Twenty-four Hours Daily, in in order to supply the demand for Mirroroide Screens—Why?

The Business World Has Discovered that Truth Is Essential to Business Success.

WE TELL THE TRUTH

A Visit to Newburgh is Convincing Proof that We Own and Control The Largest Factories Absolutely Devoted to Projection Screens in The World. Our Business is Founded upon the Essential Features of Truth: That We Ship More Screens Weekly Than the Combined Output of All Others, We Can Substantiate with Any Amount in Cash! Real Cash! Actual Cash!

Why? Every Mirroroide User Is A Mirroroide Booster. Again Why?

THIS IS WHY

Bloomington, Ind.

I have a (We Don't Knock) screen in my theatre, and as the room is so wide, the view of the pictures at the extreme end seats is dim. We have a Mirroroide Screen in our other house here, which is also wide; but the picture is much better from extreme side seats. Repeat order.

JAS. P. LEFFLER. Bloomington, Ind.
Rec. Oct. 15, 1913.

AGAIN.

How soon can you make shipment on a 16 x 18 screen? Would say we have been using a Mirroroide Screen in our Princess Theatre, Waterbury, Conn., over a year.

A. B. COBB. Oct. 15, 1913.

(Repeat Order.)

Ship at once another screen to New Haven, Conn. Have been using Mirroroide Screens over a year. Am more than satisfied. Size 18 x 22.

S. I. POLI,
New Haven, Conn., Oct. 15, 1913.

(Again. Repeat Orders.)

Enclosed find $50.00 for another Mirroroide Screen. Our new theatre opens in about ten days. Oct. 17.

A. ENGLE, Ft. Dodge, Iowa.

(Still Once More)

I have purchased six screens from you within the past two years. Am on the market for another Mirroroide.

E. W. RAMSAY,
Mansfield, Ohio, Oct. 10, 1913.

But Why Indulge? Why give you the Words of Praise we receive daily? We Don't Boast. We Show You. Get Our Large Free Samples, Postage Free, Later On (Now in Hands of Printers), Our 30-Page Catalog.

Our Latest Method in Hanging Is So Simple a Child Can Do it. It is Protected by Pending Patents.

Our Latest Silver White, Silver Flesh and Silver Amber (Pale Gold) Mirroroide gives you your choice.

Solax Special Fe

This production was produced under the personal direction of Madame Alice Blache, the producer of "The Pit and the Pendulum," "Fra Diavolo," "Dick Whittington and His Cat," and numerous other big and high-class attractions. All the finesse of her art and wealth of her imagination are embodied in this work. She has developed a theme from a nucleus of a peculiar type of criminal—a type appealing and interesting alike to the imaginative student of humanity as to the matter-of-fact business men and women.

ROGUES OF

Featuring the Well-Known FRAUNIE

Produced under the personal

A gang of crooks in dress suits, an old roue (the guardian of a young heiress), an adventuress and a young spendthrift conspire to swindle the young heiress out of her fortune and divide it among themselves in four parts. The means they employ are revelations in criminal ingenuity. Unforeseen and surprising obstacles arise in the persons of a young female amateur detective, her guardian and sweetheart, a great Parisian criminologist and a young millionaire.

The exterior scenes were all taken on the Lake Hopatcong estates of the late Russell Sage and the great Hudson Maxim, author, inventor and philosopher. The castles, promenades and landscapes forming the settings for some of the outdoor action are artistic treasures. These, together with the cast and expensive properties, are indeed considerations, the value of which conservative buyers should not overlook.

The two-color twelve page art booklet for this subject is an achievement and a fitting circular reflecting the elaborateness of the production. And besides there is the usual quota of paper—the attractiveness for which Solax is pre-eminent. The paper includes four kinds of one-sheets, two kinds of three-sheets, a six-sheet, announcement slides, heralds, photo lobby displays, and other miscellaneous material.

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and anyone can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact, they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of $3.50 we will send, by parcel post, prepaid and insured, the following:

24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address:

Sargent's Photoplay Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

THE HUMAN TORPEDO

IN THREE PARTS

Here is shown the unheard-of daring of a young woman who, in order to escape the vengeance of a disappointed lover, allows herself to be discharged from a torpedo. Sensation plus Plot.

AFTER DEATH IN THREE PARTS

A fine legitimate drama featuring Mr. Theodore Burgarth, the popular leading man of the Continental.

An old nobleman, in doubt as to the true sentiments of his four sons, feigns death and makes surprising discoveries. The play is very strong and points a fine moral.

"HOPE"

The sentiment inspired by a superb allegorical painting, becomes the moving and fascinating factor in up-to-date romance, in which pathos plays tellingly on the sympathies. A clever, spirited and picturesque melodrama of life among the lowly, with a high moral.

IN TWO REELS RELEASED NOVEMBER 3d

November 4th "SLIPPING FINGERS"

A gentle and fascinating romance of a brainy beauty who observes with alarm various opportunities slipping from her clasp until merit makes a triumph in her favor for life.

November 5th "THE PROBATIONER"

There is ever an interest in events that mark the progression of a bright boy as he begins his battle with the world. The condemnation and justification of an adopted waif makes an interesting little drama.

November 6th "THE CONVERSION OF MR. ANTI"

The self-centered man who is against everybody and everything, in time always gets trimmed for his complaints. The story of this stiff-neck complainer is well told and amusing.

November 7th "THE SCHOOLMARM'S SHOOTING-MATCH"

This breezy, wholesome Westernism is interesting and consecutive as a playlet, and has a sense of humor that will please every healthy person who relishes hearty enjoyment in a good joke.

Released Sunday, Nov. 2nd

THE WATER CURE

She was SOME "water-cured," was our pretty heroine. In the first place, she had never been to a seashore resort before. Her home was 'way inland. A married sister invited her to visit at the former's summer home by the sea. Then a rush of admirers almost drowned Miss Heroine. For she couldn't swim! Another winner in the Cape May "By-the-Sea" series.

F.C.

Released Tuesday, Nov. 4th

THE JUNIOR PARTNER IN 2 REELS

This two-reeler is notable for being the thrill-successor of "A Message from Headquarters," for the burning of a real house for its fire scenes, and for the introduction of James Durkin, the theatrical star, to motion picture audiences. As the Junior Partner, he is beaten for the hand of the girl of his heart by a foreign nobleman—who, abroad with his bride, plans to incarcerate her and take her wealth. There are great chase, race and fire scenes, and a wonderful escape through a trapdoor.

Released Friday, Nov. 8th

LITTLE BROTHER

This is a "By-the Sea" yarn from Cape May, too. It'll make you clamor for the whole celebrated series. Now, they were oh-so-much in love, and naturally there was a red-hot quarrel that sent them drifting. The man wanted her love again, nevertheless. She had a brother—yes, the Little Brother—and it was via him that the man "made up" with her again. But the little brother had a mint of fun with the Maker-Up while helping him!

Universal to spend

"RESOLVED, that the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars ($250,000) be appropriated from the net surplus of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company for the purpose of exploiting the Universal program in the United States and Canada through the medium of magazine, newspaper, billboard and street car advertising, and that the executive officers of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company be, and they hereby are, authorized to enter into a contract with the Witt K. Cochrane Advertising Agency of Chicago, Ill., on the basis of the above mentioned expenditure." (Unanimously adopted.)

THIS EXTRACT from the minutes of a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, held Tuesday, Oct. 28th, will give the exhibitors of America an idea of our determination to teach the people that Universal exhibitors are showing by far the best program of films in the world. Not a cent of this vast appropriation is to be taken from the fund which is used for making our productions. On the contrary, it will come from the net surplus of the company—in other words, it would be "dividends" for the stockholders of the Universal if they preferred dividends to a national advertising campaign.

CARL LAEMMLE,

Largest Film Manufacturing

quarter of a million advertising campaign

THE FIRST one to benefit by this enormous advertising campaign will be the Universal exhibitor. The second will be the Universal exchange. The third and last will be the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. Up to now we have spent fortunes on improving the quality of the whole Universal program. We have succeeded in reaching the highest point in quality ever attained by any film concern. There is not even a close second to that Universal program. It is now our intention to teach the people—the "ninety millions"—that the best theatre to patronize is the theatre that shows that Universal program.

BE READY to reap the benefit of this advertising campaign from the very beginning. If you are not using that Universal program now, communicate at once with the nearest Universal exchange before it is completely represented in your neighborhood. You have either seen or heard of the astounding things we have accomplished in the past few months. We are going right ahead with our quality improvement, and at the same time we are going to create a terrific, widespread and never-ending demand for that Universal program. MOTION PICTURES

A delightful comedy-drama of society, love and the great out-doors — a sweet play proving the pleasant truth that love levels all — an echo of the hills mingled with the voice of the city.

To say that Mary Pickford is anything but inimitable in this captivating role is not telling the whole truth. Her dainty art and lovable manner punctuates the film with many exclamation points!

Phantoms

Selig. Two Reels. Released November 10th.

The world seemed gay and joyous for Matt Elliott, the young stage manager, who had early made his mark and had before him the brightest prospects for a life of ambition and accomplishment.

He had met and won a talented young woman, Natalie Storm, and materially assisted her to a successful debut on the stage.

Intoxicated by the triumph of her first public performance, she turns against her lover because he answers a call to the bedside of his dying mother instead of remaining to congratulate her.

Her love turning to hate, she blindly accepts the attentions of another man. Finding no consolation in this, she tries in vain to call back the man whose love she had cast aside.

Even a trip abroad fails to dissipate her trouble, and later she returns, only to find the man she had wronged happily married. She goes away to spend the balance of her days dreaming of the peace which might have been hers, and with only phantoms for her friends in the gathering gloom of the years to come.

The Penalty

Kleine-Cines. Two Reels Released November 11th

In a fit of anger, James Moretto kills a fellow woodchopper and flees from the scene of his crime, taking refuge at the hut of a peasant, Lawrence.

Denied assistance, he again takes to the woods, but is assisted in his hiding place by Lawrence's daughter, Annie.

After he is captured, Annie makes her way to him and brings him a revolver in the hope that he might escape. The marshal who has captured him recognizes in him his younger brother, who had disappeared years before. Torn between the affection for his brother and his duty, the marshal finally weakens and determines to assist his brother out of prison. He enters the cell, but too late, for James realizing his brother's purpose, finds that he can no longer accept the sacrifices of others, and takes his own life.

Our New Minister

Kalem. Three Reels. Released November 12th.

Joseph Conyers, who for many years has pleased the American public in his inimitable characterization of "Darius Startle" in Denman Thompson's great rural drama, "Our New Minister," appears again in this role in Kalem's great film presentation, with Alice Joyce and Tom Moore.

The story, with which most of us are familiar, is an extremely interesting one, and gives each member of the company an excellent opportunity to show his or her artistic ability. This motion picture revival of an immensely popular play is bound to make an immediate hit.

Jerry's Mother-in-Law

Vitagraph. Two Reels. Released November 15th.

Jerry's mother-in-law is a pest. But Jerry has a good time at the masque ball, where he goes, dressed in a suit of armor which was stolen from the Museum. When he is set up on a pedestal in the Museum, he frightens wife and mother-in-law when they see cigarette smoke coming from the iron headpiece.

He runs to his club, and there dons the bellboy's uniform, then returns home, where mother-in-law promptly gives him a ducking in the bathtub.

He finally gets rid of his unwelcome guest by pretending that he is a hypnotist. Mother-in-law thinks he is a lunatic and takes to the open country on the run.

A big dinner that night brings joy to Mr. and Mrs. Jerry Brown as they console themselves over their happy riddance of mother-in-law.

A Slave of Satan

Pathe. Two Reels. Released Thursday, Nov. 13th.

A splendid story, pointing the moral that folly must be paid for with sorrow and suffering. A banker's daughter, wearied with the dull routine of her life, becomes an artist's model under an assumed name. Her artist employer falls a victim to her beauty and loves her, and she accepts his advances. Finding her faithless and learning her identity by chance, he reveals all to her father, who drives her from his house. She derives a scanty living from singing in the streets and cheap cafés. She is accidentally found, unconscious from weakness, by the artist, who rescues her from her misery. He still loves her, and, taught by her folly and its consequences, she reciprocates his love. So happiness comes to them at last.

The Sea Eternal

Lubin. Two Reels. Released November 13th.

Corson, the miserly fish dealer of Rorey's Point, sees an opportunity to get rid of his business rival, John Mason.

Noticing his friendship for the pretty wife of John Topley, he circulates scandalous reports about them and succeeds in having him chased from the village.

Seeking revenge, John Mason returns and takes Mary Topley away by a ruse. They are sighted crossing the bay in a storm and are given up for lost.

Mary's daughter, Nellie, staying in the family of old Corson is befriended by his son, Ned, and they are ordered from the house

The boy and girl marry and live in another fishing village There they meet "Crazy Mary," who takes a strong liking to the bride. Ned is caught out in a storm, and "Crazy Mary" puts out in a leaky boat to rescue him. She is saved in the nick of time by John, her husband, who has just returned from his world-wide wanderings. Mary's mind returns, and the family is reunited just as Nellie presents Ned with a bouncing baby

The Boomerang

Essanay. Two Reels. Released November 14th.

Irene, daughter of the Minister of War, and in love with his secretary, Maxwell, learns that important plans for the building of a new war aeroplane have disappeared and that her father is suspected. Meanwhile it has become known that the stolen papers are absolutely useless without a "key," which was overlooked by the thief.

Realizing that another attempt will be made, she substitutes blank paper for the "key" and lies in wait for the thief. After a struggle with her, he escapes, she following. A captive in the den of conspirators, she learns that the spy is her lover, Maxwell.

They are traced by her father and the police, the plans are recovered, and the boomerang comes back. She had sacrificed all for her father, and learns that the man she had loved was a thief and spy.

The Phantom Signals

Edison. Two Reels. Released November 14th.

John Graham, a hard-hearted and miserly capitalist and railroad president, greedily grasped his dividends instead of properly equipping his railroad.

There were a great many accidents, and after each one a scapegoat was always found, and John Graham smiled grimly and went his grasping way.

The Mills of the Gods grind slowly, but they claimed his soul at last.

First it happened that his daughter was caught in a wreck and only escaped at the price of her eyesight. Later his wife was injured, and as he sped to her assistance in an auto, a freight crashed into it at an unprotected crossing, crippling him for life.

Helpless as he was, physically, Graham still sternly refused to grant the needed improvements.

Then at length, one terrible day the tearful pleading of his wife began to have its effect. In a soul-harrowing dream the victims of his road passed before him in a pitiful procession and he saw himself as he was.

Then there came to him a wonderful light, and he awoke, a changed man.

KLEINE-CINES

"For the Love of a Toreador"

(IN TWO PARTS)

(Copyright, 1913, by George Kleine)

For Release Tuesday, November 18, 1913

Francisco, a toreador, loved the pretty Lolita. Carmen, dancer at the patio, saw and feared, for she loved the big, handsome fighter.

Visiting the father of Lolita to select his bulls for the great contest, Francisco gaily kissed Lolita, vowing that he would sacrifice a bull in her honor. This message was carried to Carmen by a matador who despised Francisco and sought his ruin.

The great day came. The streets of Seville were a riot of color, and the big bull-ring was dotted with the faces of thirty thousand devotees. A matador was killed and two fine horses dropped in their tracks. Finally, Francisco struck his bull to the heart and a roar went up. And then, when Francisco doffed his hat to the pretty Lolita, the shout of victory turned to a cry of horror—for Carmen, knife in hand, was seen to lunge at Lolita! But Francisco, hero of the day, caught the deadly blade in his shoulder! La Corrida had never seen so great a day!

Truly, a masterly story, characteristic of Spain and the Spaniard—staged by Cines players at the bull-ring of Seville, Spain!

A picture essentially "Cines" in execution—reveling in those thrilling bits of personal daring so dear to the heart of the picture fan—backed by splendid acting and superfine photography.

Released Through General Film Co.
1, 3 and 6 sheets with all Kleine subjects.

A Slave of Satan

RELEASED NOV. 13th

¶ A girl of wealth, being wearied with the stale monotony of her life, for the sake of diversion becomes an artist's model under an assumed name. Her artist employer falls a victim to her charms and she accepts his advances. She, however, carried away with her new freedom, permits the attentions of the artist's friend. Later, by a strange chance, the artist learns who she really is, and angered by her duplicity, reveals all to her father, who drives her from his house. She drags on for a while a wretched living as a street singer. Finally falling ill from starvation she is found in the nick of time by the artist, who rescues her, wins her true love and marries her. This play is splendidly acted.

The Greeneyed Monster of Jealousy

IN TWO PARTS RELEASED NOV. 20th

A really moving story of childhood's sacrifice and its reward; of the folly of jealousy and the unhappiness that it causes. The sweet simplicity of a little girl conquers the prejudice of her stepfather, and when her own mother foolishly becomes jealous of his fondness for the child, wins her from her folly. The leading part is most admirably well played by a little girl of most unusual talent.

A railroad drama in two parts Released Friday, November 14th

John Graham is a railroad president of the old school, whose only thought is for dividends. Equipment and wages can take care of themselves—he wants dividends. Accident follows accident on the demoralized road until Graham's daughter falls a victim and is blinded for life. His wife is injured, and he is run down by a locomotive on an unguarded crossing while rushing to her in his automobile. But he does not relent until a terrible vision of the result of his brutality and avarice melts the man of iron, and he vows that there shall be a new era of management on his road.

Facts and Comments

A TOUR of the public libraries of this city on any Sunday will prove interesting and instructive to all who favor a modification of the Pharisaical Sabbath introduced into this country in the early part of the seventeenth century by the Puritans. The libraries on Sunday are filled almost to overflowing by eager students. Take a good look at them and strike an average and you will find that they are men and women of all ages who belong to the working classes. It is easy to be seen that they are using the one day in the week which is their own for improving their education. In the days of the witch burners they would have been punished as Sabbath breakers.

The motion picture houses in this city and in all other places where a rational observance of Sunday has come into vogue are crowded just like the libraries, and with but very few exceptions are doing just as good work as the open libraries. Here is an argument for the opening of motion picture houses on Sunday everywhere. There is likewise a hint for the organized exhibitors on how to approach the Sunday problem. Point out how the opening of libraries and art galleries on Sundays has proved of great benefit to the people and then emphasize the fact that your Sunday program specializes in educational subjects and is therefore entitled to the same consideration as the library and the art gallery. Let the fact be made plain that even in New England, Sunday exhibitions of motion pictures are permissible if the right subjects are used. This means that the Sunday show must be in keeping with the character of the day. A Sunday program specializing in educational subjects would have a twofold advantage. Not only would it attract new patronage and add to the good reputation of the picture but it would also encourage the producer who maintains special facilities for the production of educational pictures. Such educational departments as are maintained by the Pathes, the Gaumonts and the Eclair Company deserve the fullest support of the exhibitors.

FROM time to time the public is startled by flamboyant advertisements of stock-selling concerns promising to make investors rich quickly through the medium of motion pictures. Alluring "copy" is sent out showing how the small and the large investor can make incredible profits in a few months. The public is decidedly gullible when it comes to statements of motion picture profits, and this affords a fertile soil to the promoters. Indeed, the promoters in the motion picture industry are increasing at an unhealthy rate. The marvelous success of the motion picture as a paying investment has thrown a glamour around the business in the eyes of the general public. It is popularly believed that somewhere within the motion picture industry there is a golden stream where whoever will may fish and become rich ever after.

Now, it is quite true that huge sums of money have been made in the motion picture industry, but this does not mean that newcomers personally conducted by promoters are going to reap rich and immediate returns. This is true of all branches of the industry—the producing and exhibiting branches in particular. But recently circulars were sent out by certain concerns inviting investors to join in a scheme of buying up "chains of successful motion picture theaters." Every experienced film man knows that good theaters are not for sale and that even desirable locations are becoming rarer every day. To hold out the promise of sensational dividends on such a basis as the "buying up of a chain of motion picture theaters" is, to say the least, a most reckless proceeding. Exactly the same holds true of the producing end. Indeed, we know more than one man who with great experience and considerable resources has been unable to earn more than a very modest return on his investment. As every man knows, there have been numerous failures, too. The Moving Picture World deems it a duty to its present readers as well as to the public in general to warn them against these schemes of promotion. When returns of forty-five per cent. or even of fifty and one hundred per cent. are promised, the Finger of Suspicion may well get busy. We have seen more than one of these schemes start, catch a breath or two of life and then expire among the mournful sounds of unsuspecting stockholders. Nor do we in the least wish to impugn the motives and the good intentions of the promoters in all cases. In some instances, of course, the promoters are under no delusions themselves and spread the snare quite openly. It really makes no difference whether the promoters are acting in good faith or not, because reckless financeering, even with the best of intentions, will invariably lead to disaster. Many inquiries have come to this paper regarding schemes of promoters, and we issue these words of advice as a general answer to all such.

"The Flash"

By Louis Reeves Harrison

When a man becomes money-mad, when his ambition for humankind, his consideration for others, even his own faculty of enjoying what is in good taste, one by one, become perverted; when all that makes life really worth the living becomes dust in his eyes and ashes to his lips, he is of small value to society.

Now and then a man of starved and choked impulses gets into the moving picture game with no honest view of the cash value of the stakes—he labors under a misconception of the exhibitor's intelligence as well as that of the motion-picture audience—and starts in to utilize a lot of discards in order to win out by deceit. He injures the entire business if he succeeds in marketing his spiritless and vapid cast-offs, though he may bear no malice against those he hurts, no ill will towards those he helps to ruin. He really believes that no individual exists except for the sake of making money, and regards his own perversion of the truth for that purpose as part of the game. Now, it may be no heinous crime to fool the exhibitor and the public, but does it really pay in the end?

Most of us can remember when some of the early producers were turning out hack work, staff-made plays and dull adaptations, and even copying each other. Their modern props were the auto, the pistol, the phone, the lost will, the dropped letter and the beard that so completely disguised a man that his wife could neither hear nor smell him. We had the sombreroed cowboy, the tin-starred sheriff, the noble, unwashed redman, the cigarette-rolling villain, the persecuted heroine, the rescuing hero, the indurated process server, mother who could not pay the rent, the honest country boy, the dissipated city chap, the innocent man wrongly suspected of the crime, the burglar reformed by the child in a "nightie," the confusing twins, the baby left on the doorstep, the suicide mother who had been pushed, the adventuress in costly raiment and diamond solitaires, the good old priest, the unshaven tramp and all the stock characters embalmed in theatrical amber.

The business dragged along until a Star, bright and serene, rose, and then there was a long line at the box-office on "Biograph Days." The Star was a man of strong feeling and cultivated tastes. He was not a playwright. He was not a painter. He was simply a man of imagination and artistic sensibilities, who found time to do his allotted work well, who cultivated his powers of observation and put them to the best possible use, who did not permit financial or other interests to distract his attention and draw on his energies. He published nothing on the screen that had not been properly digested and lucidly arranged. He did not labor in vain.

This Star selected original plays that were bought and paid for. He made no changes in those well constructed. He adorned them with settings that appealed to the universal love of beauty and chose the best interpreters he could find. He chose vigorous men, not those impaired by too much sock and buskin, many of them destined to become prominent as star actors and capable directors. He chose women in the flush of youth and beauty, Florence Lawrence, Marion Leonord, Mary Pickford, and added their radiance to the light with which his genius was illuminating the New Art. No one of his interpreters was selected for past performance, none was in the has-been class, nearly all had a reputation to make, and people flocked to see them make it.

Leadership was the result. The photoplays had something of live interest to say and the talented producer had the ability to communicate it with such grace and force that a new era was established. Other producers followed his leadership, and the whole industry boomed. Sluggish wits were stirred; numb senses were stimulated; all feasted upon the best pictures of various kinds, and people of intelligence began to see great possibilities in the New Art. Success was made possible by original work artistically done. A large amount of creative imagination and still more of the constructive kind went into this work, and it set a pace that the most successful houses of today are doing their best to keep up.

An art that was purely imitative and formless is now being raised to its eventual perfection by bright men who are taking pains, who are producing conscientiously what is wanted by the public, but now come a lot of flapdoodle propagandists who propose to take us over the same old ground with actors whose names might count in vaudeville, with yellow posters of the Fourteenth Street frenzy, with plays that produce no reverberation in the heart of our people. They openly admit the husk inside, but claim that exhibitors of moving pictures are more or less of a joke, that they can be blinded by "THE FLASH" of tinsel on their tawdry old plays and decrepit actors. They even believe that the public prefers to be dazzled on the outside to getting solid material within.

THE FLASH emptied hundreds of fine theaters, and the sudden rush of theatrical producers to the once-despised moving picture business was caused by their flash methods, not by any disinclination on the part of the public to support performances worth while. The stage is bound to come to its own, possibly aided by moving pictures, probably through the music-drama of which Wagner dreamed, "the art-work of the future," through accomplished craftsmen and some form of artistic evolution, never through men incapable of realizing its spiritual significance and power, those who create dissatisfaction with both stage and screen by flash promise and dull performance.

No matter how dazzling the name and lurid the billboard, whatever is shown inside that belittles the intelligence of an audience is going to send people away who will not come again soon. Flash stuff has emptied the big theaters and will do the same for the little ones. It is not the rival house in the next block that causes so many of your seats to be empty, my dear exhibitor—it is your own wrong conception of the people who have come to you in friendship and confidence only to find their faith in you misplaced. You have under-estimated the good sense of the plain people. The great mass may be foolish in some ways, but it knows what it likes, and above all things it likes sincerity.

Flash men, theatrical or merely shameless, cannot get it through their ivory that today is not yesterday. Their complacent, hold-over shrewdness still dwells upon the immortal utterances of Commodore Vanderbilt and P. T. Barnum. They believe that the shell game is still running at country fairs. Flash men are not imbeciles. They are at least one grade higher. If carefully examined, they might be classed as either harmless or dangerous defectives and sent to Randall's Island for treatment. Screen plays are more truly stories than are dramas of the stage, and as such might just as well rival fiction appearing in periodicals and book form, the best of their kind that genius of the hour can create.

Educational Catalogues—II

By W. Stephen Bush

IN endeavoring to prepare a series of suggestions which might be of practical value to all persons interested in educational motion pictures, I have sought to bear in mind that a catalogue is much like a bunch of keys. The fewer the rooms in the House of Knowledge and the more simple the division of these rooms, the fewer will be the keys and the easier it will be to handle them. I think that the scheme of creating ten Grand Divisions, with the consequent advantages of the decimal system, is a good one. The question then occurs: Is it possible to adapt such a system to the present supply of motion pictures of an educational value? Is it possible to do this without being in the least arbitrary in the arrangement? It seems to me that the attempt at least might be made and some suggestions might be offered. In elaborating such a decimal system of dividing and cataloguing I have been at pains to examine existing catalogues, both old and new. I have looked with care through the regular releases as printed in the quarterly compendium of The Moving Picture World from July 1, 1913, to September 1, 1913. Altogether there have been about sixteen hundred releases, and of these there are one hundred and forty-three of distinct educational character. They represent, I think, a very fair and acceptable average of the educational subjects treated in films in the last year or two. It is reasonable to assume, too, that there will be no substantial variation in the educational output within the next six months or so. It is necessary to point out here that no cataloguing can be of any practical value where the cataloguer does not confine himself to strictly educational films but seeks to extract educational values from such subjects as "Reilly's Revenge" and "Sweeney's Dream." In cataloguing educational pictures we must take the word educational in its proper, serious and accepted sense and meaning. Any other course leads us on the shoals of theory and speculation. The man or woman looking for educational motion pictures must be guided along the widest and the plainest and the shortest road possible. "Padding" is the mortal sin of cataloguing. It is quite possible to prepare a showy and pretentious catalogue on a supply of a score of motion pictures of genuine educational character. This, however, does not give us a true and honest catalogue, and there is no room for any other. Let this example illustrate just what I mean by using the word "padding" in connection with a moving picture catalogue. Suppose we have a picture showing the dances of a native tribe in Africa. Now, this picture may be catalogued by the "padder" in a number of ways. It may be classified under "Africa," under "Ethnology," under "Native Tribes," under "Travel and Description," under "Customs," under "Geography" and under "Dances." At first glance it may seem desirable to catalogue in this way, and it may have a specious appearance of completeness. In practice, however, this style of cataloguing is confusing and wasteful. Once you succeed in impressing your order and system of classification on your "reader," such a "padding" of the catalogue will be no longer necessary. It stands to reason that almost every educational picture may be classified in the same arbitrary and deceptive way I have just shown, and thus a bulky catalogue may be prepared on a very slender foundation. This is one of the faults of cataloguing which we want to avoid.

Having, then, a due regard for the special need of the motion picture as we judge them from the average output, I think we are safe in recasting the arrangement and choice of divisions somewhat after this schedule:

1. Religion.
2. Social Economics.
3. Art.
4. History.
5. Literature.
6. Popular Science.
7. Geography, Travel and Description.
8. Trades, Industries and Occupations.
9. Animal Life.
10. Miscellaneous.

I cannot repeat too often that this arrangement is intended to suit educational pictures and not books. The somewhat encyclopedic schedule "Geography, Travel and Description" was chosen after many attempts to get the great number of scenic and topical and ethnological and generally descriptive educational pictures into one basket without making that basket too large. I might say, speaking broadly, that anything which attracts the motion picture camera by reason of its picturesque qualities may be ranged under the division mentioned. In some of the foreign languages they call these pictures "portrayals of nature." The term I have ventured to suggest not only embraces such "portrayals of nature" but also pictures in which human beings as well as nature are the legitimate object of the educational camera.

To a librarian and a cataloguer of books such a division must seem unsatisfactory. To make "Animal Life" a grand division with History and Art seems wrong. It may likewise seem much better to the librarian to make geography a subdivision of history, but what does our supply of motion pictures show? Out of the total of 143 educational motion pictures, 98 cannot be ranged under any more comprehensive classification than "Geography, Travel and Description." "Animal Life" follows next with 19 releases, 10 releases belong in the class of "Trades, Industries and Occupations," while History and Social Economics come last. The division under the Dewey system into "Useful Arts" and "Fine Arts" is, for the purposes of the moving picture cataloguer, too arbitrary and subtle. An examination of existing catalogues which have endeavored to adjust the present supply of pictures to the Dewey system regardless of consequences will convince us of the futility of this distinction between "Useful Arts" and "Fine Arts" for motion picture purposes. I think the division "Literature" is well suited to the needs of the moving picture cataloguer, but nothing should be put in this division except the classics and standard fiction. The ordinary motion picture drama is not literature, at least not yet.

The division of subjects suggested above needs the utmost care in the fixing of the subdivisions. These should be arranged in alphabetical order, of course, and here is a chance for a synopsis of, say, half a dozen lines with each subject. In arranging the Ten General Divisions which I venture to submit here, I have borne in mind the possibilities afforded for a good and effective grouping of subdivisions. I shall attempt to go fully into this important question of subdivisions in my next article.

"The Terrors of the Jungle."

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

IT has become a fad on the part of certain trade publications in the United Kingdom to belittle animal pictures, on one pretense or another. Many good people who have viewed such pictures have thought that cruelty to animals was practiced; others have scorned them because they were not realistic enough from the point of ferocity and taking of life. The normal viewpoint is one of surprise and pleasure that wild animals, no matter how long in captivity, can be brought into such close contact with human beings, and participate in certain scenes with a display of intelligence that is an education to every beholder. True, in some pictures we see a lion or some other wild animal shot, but then it must be remembered that all such animals have grown old or dangerous and that the end of things for them has come. There is no cruelty in that, no more than in shooting a horse with a broken leg.

I had a private view of "The Terrors of the Jungle" the other day, and I am impressed that this two-reel animal feature subject has made a greater appeal to me than any of Selig's product, of the same type, yet viewed by me. It is a veritable novelty in the animal line, and I believe it will go down in film history as the finest educational animal picture (especially for children), made, up to the present time.

Scene from "The Terrors of the Jungle" (Selig).

After a thrilling scene, where Mrs. Milbank and her three year old daughter, little baby Alma, have succeeded in escaping from a lion, the mother sinks in a faint. Walking up to the child comes a chimpanzee, in friendly attitude. The human-like creature takes the baby by the hand and leads her away to another scene in the forest. Baby loses her shoe on the journey and, discovering the fact, begins to cry as she sits by the side of her strange companion. The latter, with all the solicitude of a mother, enters a cave—evidently a retreat of her choosing—and returns with a banana. The child takes the fruit as naturally as if it were handed her by her parent and begins to munch it, forgetting her tears and her loss meanwhile. Then the big ape climbs a tree, expecting the child to follow her, but soon descends and again sits by her newly found charge. No child, who views this scene, nor adult either, will ever forget it.

The attack on the raft (on which the mother and child have sought refuge), by a swimming lion is a thrilling spectacle. The colored servant is seen beating the animal on the head and paws as it attempts to board the raft. The atmosphere of the African jungle has certainly been imprinted on these films, and there is nothing in the matter of killing things throughout the entire length.

A fierce, skulking jaguar—it must be said that he is out of his habitat in Africa—is seen pursuing the mother and child in another thrilling scene. He climbs a tree after them and snarlingly gazes at them as they cling to an upper, swaying branch. He is interrupted by the approach of a huge elephant, which comes crashing through the jungle, and slinks away in the deep shadows. This same elephant is seen later in the films, chasing, for dear life, the villain of the story.

The principal characters, Jack Milbank and his wife, are ably sustained by Wheeler Oakman and Miss Bessie Eyton. Blackmoor, the adventurer, is well drawn by Roy Watson. Baby Alma, who will delight the eyes of all, is taken by little, toddling, Lucille Carter.

An old miner, Tom Milbank, who has amassed much gold from his mine in the African wilds, is stricken with what he knows is his death sickness. He dispatches a trusted colored serving man to his son, with a map showing the location of the mine, and then dies all alone.

Scene from "The Terrors of the Jungle" (Selig).

Jack Milbank, his wife and little daughter live in a clearing in the jungle. Nig, the colored messenger, falls exhausted just as he nears the clearing and is discovered by Blackmoor, who robs him of the map. Jack Milbank comes along immediately afterwards and revives Nig. The latter searches for the papers given him by his master and finds that they are gone. Then he points to Blackmoor, now some distance away, and accuses him. Jack overtakes the adventurer and secures the papers after a struggle.

Young Milbank, with his wife and child, accompanied by Nig, set out by wagon for the site of the mine and cave. Many vicissitudes are undergone during the journey and the search for the hidden wealth. By chance the secret cave is discovered and Blackmoor, who again had come into possession of the map, was not only disappointed in his hopes, but lost his life into the bargain. These reels will be included in Exclusive service, and the date of release will be announced later by the General Film Co.

A NEW SELIG ADOPTION.

Owing to the great success of the trick pictures, known as "Doc Yak Dreams," by Sidney Smith, the celebrated cartoonist of The Chicago Tribune, arrangements have been perfected by the Selig Polyscope Co., for making this a regular feature. This series of comics takes an entirely new vein of handling with a very amusing and original subject.

SELIG BUYS TWO GIRAFFES.

One of the transactions of W. N. Selig on his recent trip to Europe was the purchase of two young giraffes at Hamburg. They are said to be a beautiful pair of animals, and at the present time are nine feet high. They were shipped through to Los Angeles and are now housed at the Selig animal farm in that city. Anyone who knows the market price of a giraffe and the trouble of maintaining one will realize the extent to which Col. Selig will go to get realism. Among his other purchases were four elephants and several dromedaries.

ANOTHER PICTURE HOUSE TO BE OPENED.

The Garden theater, the first of a chain of new picture houses to be conducted by the Island Amusement Company, of Wheeling, West Va., is soon to be opened in that city. The managers say that the Garden is the most up-to-date house in Wheeling and the only one to be devoted exclusively to pictures. It is fireproof in every respect. The operating room has two Power's No. 6-A projectors. A Mirroroide screen, measuring 18 feet by twenty three feet, is the projecting surface.

"A Cause for Thanksgiving."

A Humanizing Edison Release.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THERE is an effect on character in photoplays of this kind, especially when the atmosphere of American home life is so well preserved as in "A Cause for Thanksgiving." Throughout all the turmoil of this progressive age, there is always the softening influence of home for those who have homes where the old folks still live, and this fondness for the abiding place of the family is never more pathetically shown than at this season of the year. Men and women lay aside the cares of business and society and devote themselves for a brief period to the intensification of family relations with a reverence that has deepened the character of the nation.

The Edison play first shows a tendency on the part of a husband occupied with business, and a wife turning hard and cold because of social ambition, to drift away from one of the tenderest of old customs and from the community spirit to a form of selfish individualism. The husband and father of grown children is involved in menacing commercial difficulties and is inclined to regard the old fashion of dining with mother on the farm as a possible relief from the strain he is under, but the wife has come to regard observance of the occasion as more or less of a bore. They decide, in view of hard times, that they have nothing in particular to be thankful for and send mother a letter declining her warm-hearted invitation.

Scene from "A Cause for Thanksgiving" (Edison).

Perhaps the most interesting character is that of the patient and philosophical old lady who receives this letter from her son. For her, now along in the world, almost out of the world, living in retrospect, transferring her affections to her grandchildren, Thanksgiving Day is an annual holiday of the highest importance, softening and purifying in its effect, and it is to her the happiest of three hundred and sixty-five days. She looks forward to it and prepares for it with delightful anticipation of reunion with those she holds most dear. Now comes an end to her hopes and plans. She does not bow under any sense of being wronged. She is not overcome by self pity. She has been too long resigned to what is beyond her control. Her character, as shown in the play, is one of great strength and beauty. It dominates the situation.

Destiny takes a hand in the game, destiny as represented by the power of circumstances, and rearranges matters. The busy father and society mother, who think they have nothing to be thankful for, remain at their city home and permit their grown children, son and daughter, to attend a college football game. The train returning from the game is wrecked—there is an interesting scene at this point—and the children are among those saved. They find that they are not far from grandma's home and go there on foot.

News of the train wreck is brought to the father and mother at their home in the city, and they set off in their motor car for the scene, one sick at heart, the other nearly insane from shock. They do not find their children at the wreck, but they trace them gradually to where all are reunited at the old home. The final scene is tender and humanizing. Honors in acting go first to Lizzie Conway, but William Bechtel the versatile, charming Elizabeth Miller and Bessie Learn, contribute heavily to the force and beauty of the production. It will win.

The Ed-Au Club is Organized.

Photoplay Editors and Writers Form an Association for the Monthly Discussion of Topics of Interest.

THERE was a gathering of photoplay writers and editors on Saturday evening at the Taverne Louis, Twenty-third Street, New York. The occasion was incidentally the enjoyment of a dinner and specifically the formation of the Ed-Au Club, to be composed of editors and those who have to their credit ten produced scripts. Following the repast it was decided to hold a dinner each month and discuss matters of interest to the craft. The first regular occasion will be on November 15, at which time there will be submitted for the consideration of the members a brief code of working rules. The following officers were elected, to serve six months: President, Phil Lang, editor of Kalem scripts; first vice-president, F. Marion Brandon, editor of Eclair; second vice-president, Gene Gauntier; secretary, Epes W. Sargent; committee on by laws, Mrs. Brandon, Bennie Schulberg, editor of Famous Players, and E. M. Wickes of the Writers' Magazine.

Mr. Lang made an address, in which he alluded to a big production which the Kalem Company has been working on in Canada. It dealt with the conquest of Quebec, and will probably be released in five or six reels. His company, he said, also had other large projects in contemplation. He said the Famous Players and other companies had shown the possibilities of multiple-reel pictures. It was only a matter of time, he added, when scenario writers would be called on to write these great features. When that time comes, he said, it will be a question of real merit. Then the greater photoplay writers, the men and women of experience and ability, will take their places alongside the dramatic writers.

Among those who sent regrets were Roy L. McCardell, of the New York Sunday World; William Lord Wright, photoplay authority; Marguerite Bertsch, Vitagraph editor; George Fitzmaurice, Patheplay editor; Lawrence S. McCloskey, Lubin editor, who included in his telegram, also George Terwilliger, Emmett Campbell Hall, Shannon Fife, Edwin Barbour, Clay Greene, Norbert Lusk and Mae Havey.

There were many renewals of old friendships, it having been years since some of those present had last met. Gene Gauntier received so many compliments on her achievements she was visibly embarrassed. There were informal talks by many of those present, and it was agreed that the proposed organization would be a go. Present besides those already mentioned were: Jack J. Clark, who privately intimated that he did not quite belong, inasmuch as he was a half reel shy of the qualifying ten produced scripts; C. B. ("Pop") Hoadley, of the Universal script department, who complained that Epes Sargent talked so much he could not get a look-in; Arthur Leeds, former Essanay and Selig writer and now editor of Photoplay Author and chief instructor of the home correspondence course, of Springfield, Mass.; George L. Sargent, Eclair director; Jim Cogan, George Hennessy, and C. D. Hobart, free lances; Mrs. Schulberg, Lyman De F. Brandon, Mabel Condon and George Blaisdell.

DAVID W. (LAWRENCE) GRIFFITH WITH MUTUAL.

The Mutual Film Corporation has secured the services of David W. Griffith, for many years producing manager of the Biograph Company and the highest salaried stage director in the moving picture business, if not in the whole theatrical world.

Mr. Griffith will produce large screen attractions for the Reliance and Majestic Companies and will supervise the pictures in script form for the entire Mutual program as well as act in an advisory capacity to all the Mutual's producing companies.

The enormous amount of work of which this acknowledged genius of the screen is capable has long been a matter of moving picture history and his entrance into the Mutual ranks is being heralded with delight by all persons directly and indirectly interested in Mutual pictures.

His salary is said to be more than $2500 per week and an instance is recorded where he refused that amount. His value is, perhaps, best appreciated when it is recalled that he has introduced many rules of moving picture stage craft which are recognized as absolutely essential to the art today and he possesses a power to tell "a story in pictures" which almost amounts to genius. A small insight into the secret of his success may, perhaps, be gained by noting the fact that although he demands the hardest kind of work from his actors and is most exacting during the making of a picture, the regard in which he is held by them amounts almost to worship.

In fact, it is the usual thing to hear his people, by whom he is affectionately spoken of as "Larry" claim that he is the greatest man that this country has produced.

"How Wild Animals Live."

Midgar Features. Five Reels.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush

THIS feature has merits of a high order. It is entertaining in the best sense of the word and at the same time rich in educational values. I am glad to say that I have no doubt whatever that the percentage of exhibitors in favor of using such pictures is large all through the country. To a Sunday program or to a refined motion picture entertainment these reels are most welcome. It may be pointed out here that the advertising possibilities of these pictures are far above the average and that intelligent handling of the press in any locality will secure columns of space for this attraction and bring hosts of new and desirable patrons.

The taking of these pictures has been attended with some difficulty. The man who hunts with a rifle to kill does not need to have one tenth of the care and patience as the hunter with the motion picture camera. It would lead too far to enumerate all the obstacles that stand in the camera man's way but one trouble is well-known. Wild animals take alarm at the clicking of the motion picture camera. Before the operator can begin his work it is necessary to conceal an instrument which imitates the click of the camera about the haunts of the animals to disarm their ever vigilant suspicions.

Scene from "How Wild Animals Live" (Midgar).

Thus it was necessary to spend days about a nest of the Moor Hen, aptly called the "Shy Bird of the Marshes," but in this instance the patience of the camera man was amply rewarded. He finally succeeded in getting a series of pictures showing the nest with its eggs at very close range. We see the hatching of three of the eggs and nothing could be more wonderful and more instructive than to see nature's laws work itself out in the nest of the bird as well as in the home of man. The mysterious rule that every birth in nature is painful, with the sole exception of the lowest orders of life, is most pathetically demonstrated in the case of these poor little chicks of the moor hen who, after leaving the shell which they have pierced with so much trouble, lay gasping upon the nest until the air and the sun aided them in the struggle to sustain life. Pitiful was the ending of the little family of moor hens for in the night the water rats, who had been watching the birds, descended upon the nest and changed nature's pretty idyl into a tragedy. A similar tragedy is shown as it takes place in the world of insects. We see a bee blunder into the cunning web of a large and hideous spider. Both insects are seen to tremble with excitement. The bee held fast in the toils cannot get away and the spider fastens its venomous little tubes and its strong legs about the bee; now the latter works himself free and the spider returns for a moment to its hole only to issue forth again a second later and now it renews the attack savagely. The thin web gives away, the climax in the tragedy in mid-air has come, the bee, half dead and enmeshed in countless little silken strands, falls to the ground. There is a comic anti-climax as the spider looks with evident disappointment over the broken threads down to the ground, very much like a man who has just dropped his cigar or his knife into a place where he will probably never get it again.

The element of humor is not wanting in these pictures. A young bear, with an inherited taste for honey and a greater appetite than discretion, goes hunting for honey on an old tree trunk. He discovers a fine supply of sweetness but before he can help himself he discovers a lot about the stinging abilities of hornets and he beats a very hasty retreat followed by swarms of angry insects. The pictures cover a very wide range of animal life showing interesting things in the lives of serpents, beasts of prey, denizens of water and forest and especially of birds in the air and birds in their nests. Every climate on this globe is represented on the screen. Indeed, among the great merits of these pictures the charm of variety must be placed first. It is this feature which will make these reels acceptable to every audience everywhere. It is likewise in order to mention the fact that these pictures give us portraits of animal life such as we have never seen before. The story of the dormice, of the Tarantula spider, the salamanders and lizards, the dingoes or wild dogs of Australia, the five-crested kinglet and scores of others represent efforts in an entirely new direction.

"THE DEATH WEIGHT" (Essanay).

The Essanay Film Manufacturing Company will release on Friday, November 7th, a startling melodrama of present day underworld tactics. "The Death Weight" has many exciting and thrilling situations unique and uncommonly unusual to the keen observer of motion pictures.

Mr. William Bailey, as the cast-off, good-for-nothing nephew of Old Silas Pegg (Frank Dayton), plays the role in, not only a true to life manner, but puts the desired punch into the part, that makes it stand out above anything he has heretofore accomplished.

Scene from "The Death Weight" (Essanay).

Miss Beverly Bayne, the heroine of the piece and niece of Silas Pegg, does more than justice to her role.

Silas Pegg has willed all his money to his niece and when his two nephews from the city discover that they are about to be left out, start trouble, first, by kidnapping the aged man and secondly by capturing Pegg's niece and holding her prisoner in a hay loft over a barn. Richard Travers, in the role of Tom, the sweetheart of Pegg's niece, with the aid of the detectives, succeeds in freeing and saving Pegg and his niece from a terrible death. The action is good and keen throughout, while the photography is far above par. E. H. Calvert, as the detective, does excellent work.

A TERRITORY JUMPER.

A statement has been issued by the Eclectic Film Co., to the effect that that firm some time ago sold the exhibiting rights for "The Mysteries of Paris," in Washington, Oregon and Idaho, to a party by the name of Herman Brown. The Eclectic Company has recent information that Brown has abandoned his Seattle office and is contracting for exhibitions of the film in whatever territory he chooses to roam, with his reels under his arm. The Eclectic people desire to warn exhibitors, renters and others in the trade against having anything to do with exhibitions of Brown's set of films outside his territory, as any such exhibition is liable to be stopped at any moment. The Eclectic Film Co. would appreciate any communications concerning the operations of Brown, same to be addressed to 110 West 40th Street, New York. Brown was last heard of in Western Canada.

"The Whimsical Threads of Destiny."

Special Vitagraph Feature in Two Parts.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

SOME new and attractive personalities are injected into this interesting drama, itself founded on the idea many of us have entertained and Bobby Burns admirably expressed, that of seeing ourselves as others see us. An eccentric old millionaire, impersonated with characteristic fidelity and intelligence by Charles Kent, has a secret room constructed in his house, to which there is access through an entire mantel-piece swinging on its hinges, and there he prepares to hide after his attorney gives out the report that he is dead and buried. Through this mantel he can see and hear all that transpires in the principal living-room of his residence.

Scene from "The Whimsical Threads of Destiny" (Vitagraph).

The idea is such a good one that it opens up all sorts of possibilities, especially those of comedy, to the creative mind, but the venerable millionaire's specific scheme relates to the disposition of his large fortune. His sole relatives are a "distant niece," Julia Swayne Gordon, and a "distant nephew," Courtenay Foote. Word is sent to these two that the uncle is dead and that his money will become theirs in the event of their marriage. The niece is to occupy the house during courtship, while the nephew, a practicing surgeon of actor-like physiognomy, is to meet his enforced fiancee in the living-room, where they will be directly under observation during a test of their relative characters.

Scene from "The Whimsical Threads of Destiny" (Vitagraph).

Destiny, the irresistible tendency of influences we can only vaguely define, what I am constrained to call the power of circumstance, begins to set up a complication soon after the young people meet. They go out for an evening's entertainment and take front seats at a circus performance. Among the real attractions are two equestriennes, the St. Leon Sisters, Elsie and Vera. Ordinarily, these circus riders are more than seven, but here is a refreshing exception. They are young, pretty, well-informed, graceful, and all the other nice things we critics so seldom have a chance to say about motion picture actresses—and they can act.

The girls are professional riders, but they appear to be without theatricalism—they are so sweet that we quite approve when the young surgeon becomes infatuated with Stella. From that moment our sympathies are with her, and our eyes never wander from her when she is in evidence. She is a veritable star. She falls from her horse and breaks her arm; call is made for a surgeon; the nephew responds with actor-like ardor; he sets her arm in an emergency splint; his fiance looks on green-eyed; so does the villainous ring-master, and a hot time is promised. There are some villainous deeds done by the jealous ones, but true love triumphs in the end. That end is slightly marred by the absence of the real center of interest, the Sweet Stella, for what do we care about the property, and the end shows scheming uncle, lawyer and the nephew toasting each other over the outcome of the experiment.

They should have been toasting the real agent of destiny, she who made the happy outcome possible. Among the minor roles, those of Mr. Dunn's ring-master, and an acrobat by young St. Leon are to be praised. The whole performance is a delightful one of its kind, marred by nothing offensive to good taste and given in an admirable form and treatment that may come to be called the "Vitagraph Style." The excellence of direction is, in this case, that of Frederick Thomson. The author is Eugene Mullin, one of the comers.

ENERGETIC M. P. SALESMAN.

Seldom in the annals of the motion picture industry has so much interest been taken in any special film production, and never, within our memory, have such rapid results been accomplished as in the case of the recently imported English film of "A Message from Mars," which is now being put on the market as a state right subject. It has a distinction, inasmuch, that it features Charles Hawtrey, England's foremost actor. It was brought to this country by James McEnery, a prominent English film producer and who is here representing the United Kingdom Film Co. and other British picture concerns.

James McEnnery.

Mr. McEnnery, arrived in New York a few days ago and in an incredibly short space of time has done wonders with his picture. Since its first exhibition here it has created a lively interest among state right buyers and little territory now remains to dispose of. Several well known moving picture managers are negotiating for Canadian territory and road companies will be organized.

All of the work of presenting and arranging the sales of "A Message from Mars" has been accomplished by James McEnnery, who, although a perfect stranger in New York and in spite of innumerable obstacles due to a lack of knowledge of conditions, has, in the brief space of a few days, succeeded in disposing of practically all of the territory at his disposal. Mr. McEnnery is a shrewd and persistent worker and his operations in the foreign motion picture field have gained him a reputation all over the European continent. He is here in the interests of the U. K. Film Co., of London, and is also president of the Anglo-Continental Agency, of London and Paris. He is financially interested in several foreign film manufacturing firms and is the founder and president of the Noxall Films, a British product which has not yet been introduced in this country. The first Noxall film subject will be offered to the American trade in a few weeks. Mr. McEnnery has established headquarters on the 3rd floor of the Hidelberg Bldg., at 42nd Street and Broadway.

SINGER MEETS TRAGIC DEATH.

Many exhibitors of the middle west will read with regret of the untimely and tragic death of Victor Brunswig, of the well known singing team of Brunswig Brothers, the New York Harmony Boys. Mr. Brunswig was struck by a locomotive on October 15, at Manito, Illinois, a small village near Peoria. The Brunswig brothers were filling a theater engagement at the Columbia Theater, in Peoria, at the time. The interment was at Princeville, Illinois, which was the home of the deceased.

"Fantomas, or the Man in Black."

Four Reels, Gaumont Feature

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

A PERFECT cloud of sensations bursts upon us in this feature. The impossible and the unheard-of seem commonplace at the end of the last reel. In this continuation of the popular detective story known as "Fantomas, or the Man in Black," all the fine evidences of Gaumont quality are present. It has been said that the Gaumont features crowd more things on the screen than the features of the average producer and this claim is well borne out in the four thousand feet just reviewed.

The Man in Black, the mysterious lawbreaker, is once more in a desperate duel with a detective. The latter is reinforced by a clever journalist of the type which, in France, passes for American. The man in black has allies everywhere and his resourcefulness is infinite. Just to give one instance of it. He is sitting in a fashionable restaurant in Paris with two handsome young ladies who, as the title informs us, are wealthy. His clever sweetheart, in another part of the restaurant, is seen and recognized by the journalist, who has just sat down to a meal with M. Juve, the detective. M. Juve threatens to arrest the young lady unless she informs him at once where The Man in Black is to be found. Most reluctantly, the sweetheart betrays The Man in Black. M. Juve sends the head-waiter to the table where The Man in Black is sitting with the two wealthy young ladies. The head-waiter interrupts the charming party and tells The Man in Black that a stranger wishes to see him immediately. The Man in Black smiles in a superior way and leaves the table after, of course, excusing himself to the young ladies. As he nonchalantly leaves the restaurant, M. Juve and his amateur assistant seize his two arms—a moment later The Man in Black has broken away from his pursuers and they hold two wooden arms and an empty coat in their hands, while The Man in Black is bidding them a jeering farewell from the rear of an automobile that almost sprang out of the ground the very second it was needed.

Scene from "Fantomas, or the Man in Black" (Gaumont).

Again M. Juve and the journalist chase The Man in Black into a tank filled with water. Quick as a flash The Man in Black pierces the bottom of a bottle dives under the water and keeps himself concealed and thoroughly alive by drawing air through the bottle, while his army of pursuers are blundering in every direction. There is, in the earlier part of the feature, a collision between a wild car and a fast express, and I, for one, have not been able to figure out whether it was the genuine thing or a very clever imitation. The "piece de resistance" of the feature, however, is "The Dumb Executioner." This executioner is a huge python, and the scene where he climbs up to the sleeping M. Juve, with all the painful deliberativeness which large pythons are apt to display, there is not a nerve in any of the principal centers which does not labor under the thrill. All through the early part of the feature there are echoes and suggestions of the "Great Train Robbery" of sensational memory. The end of the feature leaves the spectator in profound suspense. It was the exact psychological moment for the "Continued in Our Next" effect.

The acting of all the principal characters is beyond all praise. A good test of the quality of acting in any feature is the acting of the minor parts, and these parts are rendered with every possible skill. There is throughout the painstaking attention to detail which characterizes most Gaumont productions. The settings are excellent; the photography is unexceptionable. This feature promises to achieve great popularity with exhibitors in search of the sensational.

"THE PRIMEVAL TEST" (Rex).

In this day and age when the domestic laws of God and Man are held lightly by many, when separation and divorce induces but a passing comment, such a play as this should prove of especial interest. There are those who are always ready to suggest cures for matrimonial ills, but it is a question if any have offered such a unique—and for that matter, plausable—cure as the one contained in the present play. It is drama first, yet it has a strong moral lesson and provides considerable amusement of the higher order.

Dr. Harrison, a student of human nature, believes that environment largely moulds one's character. He writes as much to his friend, Bob Stannard, who, owing to business, has been neglecting his wife. Bob discovers the slight affair between his wife and the friend and he realizes that something must be done. On the following day he calls upon the doctor and recounts his troubles. He is reminded of the primeval days when men carried their women to lonely caves and held them until worldly cares were forgotten. The suggestion strikes home to the disconsolate husband.

Scene from "The Primeval Test" (Rex).

In the meantime Bob's wife has decided to leave him and join the admirer. Bob learns of it as she is about to depart, takes her by main force, blindfolds her and carries her bodily to an auto.

In the lonely hills he forces her to dress in skins while he adoptes the same garb. Although he longs to take her in his arms he is stern and compelles her to obey. As time goes on she admires his strength and finds his domination less irksome.

A final test is decided upon. A letter is sent to the old admirer by the doctor informing him of the whereabouts of Mrs. Stannard. The misguided youth starts in search—he comes upon her in the strange garb. Bob, waiting, surprises both and drives the interloper off and the wife demonstrates that she is fully conquered and love is complete for her husband.

THE LARGEST MIRROR SCREEN.

The largest Mirror Screen ever made has just been installed in the new Grand Motion Picture Palace, at Lancaster, Pa. This screen measures 14 x 19 feet and weighs in its frame two tons. The arrival and moving of the big screen was well advertised by William R. Strong, who will be manager of the new house, and much local interest was worked up by the time the screen arrived. The Grand is a magnificent piece of theater architecture, costing $90,000. William Snyder, a well known capitalist and successful business man of Lancaster, is the owner.

KANSAS STATE CONVENTION.

Exhibitors of the "Sunflower State" Hold Big Meeting at Hutchinson—Next at Salina.

THE third annual convention of the Kansas State Branch, Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, was held at Hutchinson, Kan., on Monday and Tuesday, October 20-21, 1913.

There was a very large attendance, nearly one hundred exhibitors being present. The meeting was a very enthusiastic one and a large amount of important business was transacted, including the election of officers.

On Monday there was an open meeting. State Superintendent of Buildings O'Brien delivered an address; also managers of various film exchanges serving the exhibitors in the state, addressed the convention.

President C. E. Glamann, in his annual report, stated that the state branch was in the best financial condition since its organization. He also reviewed the work done by the state league during the past year and that the membership had been increased by forty in the last five months. He expects the membership to increase by at least fifty between now and the next meeting, which will be held in March at Salina, Kan.

On the question of censorship, Jack Brainard, of Mulberry, one of the live wires of the motion picture organization in Kansas, said that the motion picture censorship law, now a dead letter on the statute books, merely created political pie. "There was no need of such a law. Every exhibitor should be a censor for his community. I am for mine and have cut out pieces of film, haven't used others, for the reason that I thought some sensitive person might object. If there is even the slightest question I cut out that film."

A. C. Ackerman, of the Palace Theater, Salina, discussed the question of quality. "Give the people the best you can get," he said, "and you can get a better price and make more money. The better people appreciate merit in motion pictures as well as they do in any other line. The highest-priced pictures I have ever exhibited are the ones that I made the most money on.

"Somebody sold me a lemon, but I took the show and cleaned it up, got the best stuff possible. I expected to lose money on some of the pictures, merely buying them for an ad, but found that the people liked them better and that I could get a bigger price for good stuff. I have had the programs of my shows announced from the pulpits of Salina. I have given them lyceum lecture courses in my motion picture theater, and have made money on it.

"One thing I don't do. I don't show educational films except rarely. We have two colleges in our town, and I leave that to them. People come to my theater to be amused and entertained, so I get them the best comedy, and the best drama and western films that I can get, and they will pay extra to see them."

The convention closed with a banquet at the Midland Hotel where the members were the guests of Joseph Sheso, Universal Exchange, and C. C. Ezell, Mutual Exchange.

The following officers were elected for a term of one year: National vice-president, C. E. Glamann, Wellington; State President, Jack Brainard, Mulberry; secretary, Geo. McCrum, Kansas City, Kan.; treasurer, W. H. Willey, Mulberry.

Partial list of the members present: Geo. McCrum, Kansas City, Kan.; Christ. Wagner, Newton; Jack Brainard, Erie; Fred Savage, Great Bend; Karl Bornschein, Ellsworth; W. H. Willey, Mulberry; Guy E. White, Beloit; Howard Dull, Augusta; C. E. Glamann, Wellington; Ford L. Wright, Wichita; Chas. E. Kraus, Cedar Vale; Geo. H. Merriam, Kingman; H. E. Herbert, Newton; W. B. More, Galena; Barney T. Lee, Hutchinson; P. J. Concannon, Emporia; Wm. Frain, Newton; W. B. Smith, Cherry Vale; Chester A. Black, Odeon; C. L. Rose, Hutchinson; Wm. Harwood, Kinsley; Chas. Ball, Garden City; Wm. Thatcher, Salina; G. A. Ackerman, Salina; A. Zuercher, Solomon; C. W. Hermis, Elmwood; Roy Bengston, Lundsberg; G. A. Kubach, Abeline; J. R. Burford, Wellington.

The following film men were present: P. C. Worth, Famous Players; Mgr. Spero, Universal; C. C. Ezell, Mutual; Carl Olson, Wichita Film Exchange; F. R. Parker, Wurlitzer Co., Cincinnati.

MAINE EXHIBITORS FOR LEAGUE.

Hold Meeting at Lewiston and Endorse National Organization and President Neff.

THE Maine Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America met in the assembly room of the DeWitte Hotel in Lewiston, Maine, at 2 P. M., October 21st. President M. Blumenberg, of Portland, presided. Among the exhibitors present were: E. L. Crawford, Brunswick; C. H. Seymour, Houlton; J. J. Hone, Presque Isle; C. J. Rush, Millinocket; F. E. Mortimer, Freeport, treasurer; J. W. Greeley, Portland; A. A. Allen, Bangor; F. H. Hauson, Winthrop; H. W. Gillespie, Calais; William Shea, Eastport, secretary; J. A. Emery, Bar Harbor; A. P. Bibber, Lewiston; William Gray, Lewiston; M. Blumenberg, Portland; O. B. Fernandez, Old Town, and several others. A number of exchange men and feature film representatives were also in attendance.

The convention was a grand success, harmony and good fellowship prevailing throughout the convention. Matters of importance directly affecting the Maine exhibitors were taken up and thoroughly discussed, and acted upon. The Maine State Branch of the League now numbers over forty members in good standing. An organizer will be placed in the field and the members of the league expect to have at least 95% of the exhibitors of the state of Maine join the league before their next convention, which will be held on the first Tuesday in February, 1914, at the Falmouth Hotel, Portland.

After Mr. Neff addressed the convention, by unanimous vote, the national organization and its officers were endorsed, the Maine Branch being in thorough accord with the national organization. The state of Maine will be ably and fully represented at the big national convention, to be held at Dayton, Ohio, on the first Tuesday after Fourth of July, 1914. The convention adjourned at 6 o'clock. A splendid dinner was served in the beautiful dining-room of the DeWitte Hotel, after which the members of the league were entertained at Music Hall Theater and other picture houses in Lewiston.

PITTSBURGH EXHIBITORS' NOTES.

It is not necessary for the exhibitor to go to an exposition to see the miniature theater. On my visit to the Commercial Building, I saw a striking innovation in the way of demonstrating theater equipment which has been installed by Ludwig Hommel and Company, of Pittsburgh, Pa. A miniature theater has been arranged where all phases of the moving picture equipment can be demonstrated. The room is beautifully equipped with various designs of side brackets which are controlled by separate switches, as are also the ceiling lights which consist of a various selection of indirect and fancy lighting. A table in the center of the room is placed in such a position that the various types of lights can be controlled without leaving the table. A Wagner rotary converter in actual operation furnishes direct current to a Power's 6-A Cameragraph, motor driven, which projects light on a miniature screen. In fact, it is an entire show minus the films, even the theater seating arrangement being provided by sample theater chairs in plain and upholstered effects.

The opening of the Sheridan Square Theater as a 10-15-25c vaudeville house, on Monday, October 20, was a great success. It is a beautiful theater, one that the uptown patrons should feel proud of. It is under the management of the John P. Harris Amusement Company. The seating capacity being 2,200.

The city council, of Pittsburgh, proposed an ordinance allowing only 10 per cent. standing room. The ordinance was withdrawn after the exhibitors appeared in a body and protested.

H. A. Victor is getting to be a regular big gun in the picture game, he now has a string of four houses and a live picture actor or actress every week. Panzer, of Pathe, on Thursday and Friday; Hughey Mack, of Vitagraph, on Saturday of last week, and the Nash Twins this week.

All the houses on Fifth Avenue seem to be doing a good business. It seems to be the policy here for the exhibitor to give as big a show as he can give for 5c. The Lyric is the only one that sticks to the three reels.

The Cameraphone Co., of Pittsburgh, H. Beatty, General Mgr., has added two more houses to their string. Cameraphone, at Sharpsburgh, seating capacity 530; Cameraphone, 1600 Fifth Ave., Pittsburgh, seating capacity 500, all doing good business.

Paul Panzer, Pathe player, is in our midst doing picture houses. He is a very congenial chap and the exhibitors are happy: Why? Making money.

Another new house opened on Shiloh Street, on Mount Washington, showing licensed pictures. The house is very nice, the seating capacity being 269 and meeting all city requirements. Its owner and manager, Mr. Thomas Billante. Mr. Billante is a very congenial chap and a good fellow who was formerly connected with the Underwood Ice Company.

HARRY E. REIFF.

CLEVELAND BOLTERS ORGANIZE.

Cleveland exhibitors, who have declared themselves out of the national league of exhibitors, have organized the Cleveland Motion Picture Association with the following officers: S. E. Morris, president; A. Maher, vice-president; Joseph Grossman, recording secretary; Sam Bullock, corresponding secretary, and F. M. Kenney, treasurer.

NEW YORK EXHIBITORS BALL.

The third annual entertainment and ball of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York will be held at Terrace Garden, 58th Street, between Third and Lexington Avenues, on Monday evening, December 15th, 1913. It is announced that King Baggot and Mary Fuller will lead the grand march.

OPERATORS GIVE VOTE OF THANKS.

Messrs. Welsh & Lehman, of the Princess Theater, Cincinnati, Ohio, are in receipt of a communication from the Cincinnati Operators' Local No. 165, tendering them a vote of thanks for their attitude during the recent lockout in that city.

CENSORSHIP THREATENED IN MILWAUKEE.

An ordinance has been proposed in the city council of Milwaukee, Wis., providing for a local censorship of motion pictures in that city. Upon the request of the Milwaukee exhibitors action has been deferred pending a visit to that city by Mr. John Collier, of the National Board of Censorship, who is expected to address the common council on the subject. The measure is being supported by the several civic organizations of Milwaukee aided by the Milwaukee Journal. One of the arguments advanced in favor of the ordinance was the exhibition of a number of photographs of posters used to advertise motion picture subjects.

EXHIBITORS' BRIEFS.

Syracuse has a police censor now.

Four picture theaters in Appleton, Wis., are credited with a weekly attendance of 10,000. The houses have a combined seating capacity of 1,758.

It is reported that a test of the constitutionality of the Ohio censorship law will be made.

Cincinnati exhibitors are struggling with the board of aldermen of that city over the question of show licenses.

T. C. Schafer, deputy state fire marshall, of Michigan, after a recent inspection of picture theaters in Grand Rapids, announced that all houses in that city were complying with the law.

Detroit police threaten to close picture theaters in that city on Sunday if the picture men object to the censoring of pictures at police headquarters.

LEASES BUILDING FOR PICTURE HOUSE.

Messrs W. D. Van Dyke and Harry J. McCoy, of Binghamton, N. Y., have leased the new fireproof building at 23-25 Clinton Street, that city, and will convert it into a first class picture house. The theater, when completed, will be known as the Crescent.

WATERS BUILDS NEW HOUSE.

C. N. Waters, of Corry, Pa., who has been in the picture show business for the past seven years, is building a new picture house in that city. The new theater, which will have 350 seats, is expected to be ready about the first of January next. In the meanwhile Mr. Waters will conduct his Lyric theater.

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADE

THE meeting of the Chicago Building Committee, held in the city council chamber of the city hall, Friday, October 24, to hear a discussion of the ventilation ordinance, passed March 5, 1910, between the Board of Health, headed by Dr. Young, and a large gathering of exhibitors, occupied a session of three and one-half hours. Alderman Clancy, chairman of the committee, presided.

Alderman Schaeffer, who had introduced an amendment to the ordinance before the summer recess of the council, and who is in favor of making the ordinance less harsh, in its operation, on small picture theater owners, made a brief address after the reading of the ordinance. He drew attention to the fact that the New York ventilation ordinance, passed a short time ago by the council and sanctioned by the late Mayor Gaynor, calls for only 500 cubic feet of fresh air per hour for each person, while the Chicago ordinance calls for 1,500. Besides, the Chicago ordinance calls for heated air, which necessitates a new heating system in each house. The installment of the new heating system, he pointed out, would make it impossible for two-thirds of the picture theaters to comply with the ordinance.

A letter from the Chicago Commission on Ventilation, of which John W. Sheppard is president, to Mayor Harrison, was then read by the clerk. This communication drew attention to the fact that in the winter months more people attend the picture theaters than all other places, and strongly urged the enforcement of the ordinance.

Dr. Young, health commissioner, was then called by the chairman. He referred to the false and the real issue in his discussion of the ordinance. The false issue was based on the oppression that would be felt by churches, assembly and lodge halls by the enforcement of the ordinance. The inclusion of these buildings in the same class as moving pictures, he declared, was due to an oversight, or mistake, when the ordinance was being constructed. He announced that these structures would not be subjected by him to the requirements exacted from moving picture theaters, and that the ordinance should be changed in that respect.

The real issue, he emphasized, was the fact that there are now in Chicago 605 theaters which seat 254,328 people. Four hundred thousand to five hundred thousand people, per day, visit these theaters. The two places which contribute chiefly to the spread of disease are crowded street cars and overcrowded places of amusement.

Of the 605 theaters, 189 moving picture houses have no ventilation at all; 177 comply with the ordinance, and 200, or thereabouts, are waiting to see how the cat is going to jump — they have made no effort whatever to comply with the ordinance. Cleveland and Buffalo, he asserted, have now in operation ordinances similar to the Chicago ordinance. He did not care what patent is used, so long as the required results are gained. His department was absolutely not in favor of any particular ventilating device. Fans could not fill the bill, and are of little use except to start dust.

He acknowledged that the exact requirements of the ordinance would work great hardships on some picture theater owners, but he was opposed to a reduction of the standard by any proposed changes in the ordinance. He was willing, however, to make some allowances in certain cases. The health department had been endeavoring to enforce the ordinance since September, 1912, and every man who had remodeled or built a theater since then had been warned by the health department that his plans must be in conformity with the ventilation ordinance.

Alderman Nance, also a member of the health department, next spoke in favor of the ordinance.

F. O. Nielson, owner of the Stevens and Parkway Theaters, was then given the floor. He showed that he had installed in both houses ventilating systems of superior merit, and that his patrons, who were of the best type of citizens, had never complained of discomfort. He could not see the equity of being compelled to put in another system, costing over $3,000, that would not bring him or his patrons any compensating benefits. Dr. Hill, an assistant of Dr. Young, denied some of the statements made by Mr. Nielson, but acknowledged that the adequacy of his present system may not be amiss.

Henry Horner, special attorney for the exhibitors' organization, was the next speaker. He spoke as the representative of some 400 picture theater owners, he said. These men stood for safe and sane ventilation, but were against fads and experiments. They stood against the owners of certain patent devices for ventilation, and he hinted that the ordinance was a move to bring the people down to the larger theaters in the Loop District. He considered 1,500 cubic feet of fresh air, per hour, for each individual, in excess of natural requirements. The highest authorities had declared 900 feet sufficient. The requirement of the ordinance that there should not be more than 10 parts of carbon dioxide to 10,000 parts of atmosphere was also excessive in demand. Twelve parts in 10,000 was a good test. His clients stood for a dioxide test as being the best and fairest, not a bacteria test such as had been made by Dr. Young and his staff.

A hint by Mr. Horner that certain owners of patent ventilating devices were making the health department's offices a sort of headquarters made Dr. Young jump to his feet in anger. He indignantly denounced the insinuation as untrue, and charged Mr. Horner as being well aware of the fact. "No particular method is required," said Dr. Young, "and the health department is committed to no particular plan. I am willing to give reasonable consideration to small men who cannot put in the big ventilating system. I have already given too much consideration to offending theater owners. I am responsible for the enforcement of the ordinance, and have no other remedy. If the injunction suit now pending is declared in my favor, I shall close every offending theater in the 24 hours following."

John W. Sheppard next took part in the discussion. He advocated sufficient air, its proper distribution and its proper cleansing. Ten parts of dioxide in 10,000 parts of atmosphere he considered the right percentage, in order to avoid danger. The carbon dioxide test alone is not sufficient, in his opinion. The bacterial test is the vital test for clean air. In the public schools of Chicago the requirements call for 1,800 cubic feet of air, per hour, for each pupil. He denounced the emission of perfumes in theaters or buildings as being a cloak for foul air.

E. D. Miller, business agent of the Moving Picture Operators' Union, followed and gave it as his opinion that the enforcement of the ordinance would be unfair. He referred to Dr. Young's threat to close all offending theaters in 24 hours, and asked what was to become of operators and their families in such event. "Do all the experimenting you want, but don't experiment with the bread and butter of ourselves and families," he shouted.

M. A. Choynski was the next speaker. He reminded the committee and the health department of the great service rendered by Chicago picture theater men in showing such films as "The Fly Pest" and others on the treatment of tuberculosis. The theater owners had actually awoke the health departments of every city in the country to a full sense of their duty. He referred to the heating of the air as an experiment. "Contractors won't guarantee the system installed by them to work," he exclaimed, "but they say, 'you have the guarantee of the health department!' "

Mrs. Harriet Vittum, president of the Woman's City Club, paid a glowing tribute to moving pictures and pointed to the great void in countless human lives which they have filled. Children especially have been greatly benefited by them, she stated, and as they flock to the theaters in such great numbers, she enjoined the building committee to see to it that good ventilation is provided so that their health be not endangered.

Alderman Clancy then declared the session closed, and invited a committee of picture theater owners to be present at the next meeting, Friday, October 31.

Indications point to an amendment of the ordinance that will make it possible for theater owners to comply with its provisions.

Two of the large theaters—the Colonial, on Randolph Street, and the Joe Howard Theater, on Congress, near Wabash Avenue—are listed among the 189 "bad air" theaters in the city.

Honor the Hero, Tom Preston!

It is hoped that the Carnegie Committee, in whose hands is placed the bestowal of medals for bravery in the saving of human life, will not overlook the name of that lion-hearted hero, Fred Preston, of Niagara Falls, Ont., who swam out fearlessly in the darkness, on the night of October 23, into the raging whirlpool below the Falls and rescued Peter W. Langeard, of Detroit, from certain death.

Langeard had made the trip through the whirlpool rapids, from the Maid of the Mist landing on the Canadian side, to the whirlpool, to furnish a scene for a moving picture. Driftwood clogged the propeller of his motor boat after he had navigated the rapids safely, and he was unable to bring his craft out of the vortex. For four long hours he fought for life, until darkness brooded over the gorge, and then fell down exhausted in the bottom of his tiny boat which had become the plaything of the seething waters.

Preston attached a lifeline to his body and swam out to the rescue, headlights from trolley cars along the Canadian shore directing him in his course. When half way out, the lifeline became entangled in the driftwood, and he was forced to return to the shore. Nothing daunted, the brave fellow made a second attempt and reached the boat, which was then half filled with water. Clinging to the side of the boat, he signaled to the men on shore to haul in the line, and was slowly drawn ashore, with Langeard more dead than alive.

Here's to Preston! Men of his stamp make us proud of the human race with all its frailties. We hope that medal will be pinned on his undaunted breast when the time of the annual distribution comes around.

The rescue would have made a thrilling scene could the camera have registered it, and would have been a lasting memorial to the gallantry of the leading character.

Dance Pictures Barred in Chicago.

A picked audience witnessed in the City Hall, Wednesday, October 22, a presentation of moving pictures designed to give instructions in dancing the hesitation waltz, the turkey trot, and the tango. At the close of the exhibition, the films were barred from public presentation in Chicago.

Those present were the guests of Major M. L. C. Funkhouser, second deputy superintendent of police, and by virtue of that office censor of Chicago's morals. The question of the production of the films was brought to him by Sergt. Jeremiah J. O'Connor, of the moving picture bureau. They were agreed that they should be barred, but gave the manufacturer a last chance by submitting them to a special audience.

This audience included the special committee of three aldermen — George Pretzel, G. H. Bradshaw and J. A. Kearns — appointed to investigate immoral dancing in public halls. Another special guest was Mrs. Gertrude Howe Britton, of the Juvenile Protective Association, and also two of the city's ten policewomen.

Major Funkhouser consulted them after the films had been run and announced the decision.

"They will not be permitted in Chicago," he said. "The objection is not based so much upon these pictures in themselves, but upon the effect they would have on thousands of young people. After witnessing these professional performers go through these dances in a carefully regulated way, they will go to the public dance halls and try them.

"That is where the danger is. Most of these halls either sell liquor or are close to the places where it is sold. Think of a young girl or a young man, with two or three drinks down, trying these dances."

Chicago Film Brevities.

George Kleine's six-part feature subject, "The Last Days of Pompeii," was given its initial presentation in Chicago at Zeigfeld Theater, on Hubbard Place, near Michigan Avenue, Sunday, October 26th, to a large and admiring audience. George Kleine's "The Last Days of Pompeii" is made by Ambrosio, and it is the only Ambrosio subject under this title in the market. There are two other legitimate Pompeii pictures on the American market, namely: The Pasquali subject, and another made by the Gloria Film Co., of Turin, Italy. Just as in the case of "Quo Vadis?" attempts are being made to foist duped, or faked, subjects under this title on unsuspecting exhibitors. One four-reel subject, under the title, "The Last Days of Pompeii," and advertised by a circular bearing a cut on which the Ambrosio trademark appears, is being handled by a concern in Milwaukee, Wis. All exhibitors are advised that George Kleine holds the American rights, and also the world rights to the only legitimate Ambrosio subject bearing the above title. George Kleine's "Last Days of Pompeii" is at present being shown throughout the length and breadth of this country, and is doing a fine business, according to reports. Many who have viewed it consider it fully equal, if not superior, to the world-famous "Quo Vadis?"

The General Special Feature Film Co., incorporated for $25,000, under Illinois laws, bought the interests of the M. & F. Feature Film Service last week. William Hershberg is president of the company named, and A. G. Spencer is secretary and treasurer. The company will move from the first floor at 167 West Washington Street to the Powers Building, on November 1st. The General Special Feature Film Co. will release four subjects weekly. Mr. Hershberg was formerly owner of the Magnet Theater, this city, and Mr. Spencer was at various times with the Standard Film Exchange, the Anti-Trust Film Exchange and the General Film Co.

C. C. Cunningham, who called at The World office last week, is building a new theater in Gary, Ind., which will be completed about April 1st. The theater, which has not yet been named, will seat 600 people, and five reels will be shown for 10 cents. Francis M. Savage, of Joliet, has charge of the construction of the theater, which will be up-to-date in every respect, including, among other modern instalments, the latest ventilating system.

"ALKALI IKE" ON HIS WAY TO PARIS.

Former Essanay Comedian Stops Over in New York to Visit Old Friends Before Beginning Real Vacation.

Augustus Carney, who is known to photoplay followers everywhere as "Alkali Ike," is in New York City looking up old friends. Mr. Carney is like all real comedians—most serious of face and manner. His visit to the metropolis is for a few days only, just long enough to secure steamship booking for the other side. Mr. Carney, who is no longer connected with the Essanay Company, left the Pacific Coast less than two weeks ago. It is not his intention to do any picture work until he has had a vacation, and is not concerning himself about an engagement. His first objective point will be Paris, where he expects to remain as long as he finds things to interest and places to visit. Then he will go to London, and then on to Ireland, the land of his birth. Mr. Carney left the Emerald Isle as a boy in his teens, and has made but one visit to his old home since. It is the first visit of the former Essanay comedian to the metropolis in nearly five years. He is no stranger here, by the way, having for many seasons started on his theatrical work from this center. He is an old-time actor and not, as many of his admirers have believed, a product of the ranch. He has been with the Essanay Company about four years, and in that time has had a marked degree of success. Who that has seen "Alkali Ike Plays the Devil" will fail to think of the comedy when they hear the pseudonym? Mr. Carney made a visit to this office, which was much enjoyed by the members of the staff. He has well-defined ideas about the making of pictures and as to the future of the industry, and expounds them in a most interesting fashion. Here's hoping he has a fine trip abroad and a good rest. But there'll be no doubt that if he wants rest on the other side he'll have to keep out of sight, for everybody will recognize him. Still, he is accustomed to that, for he has had experience. He had a lot of it in Chicago last winter.

JIM COGAN WITH FAMOUS PLAYERS.

Jim Cogan, an old-time picture man, who has had experience in the Biograph, Edison and Universal establishments, is now assisting Bennie Schulberg in the scenario department of the Famous Players. Mr. Cogan knows pictures and he knows scripts. He has good judgment and he is a lover of the best. The company and the man are to be congratulated.

SPECIAL MUSIC FOR KLEINE'S "POMPEII."

The well-known Chicago music composer, Palmer Clark, has prepared a fifty-page score, written especially for "The Last Days of Pompeii," portraying the sentiment and emotions of that time. The music has been bound in neat volumes and is to be sent in advance to the theater musicians where "Pompeii" will be shown. Mr. Kleine expects to adopt this as a regular custom for all future big subjects.

AUTHENTIC LITHOGRAPHS AND POSTERS.

In order to secure the best advertising results for its well-known feature film, "Les Miserables," the Eclectic Film Company has arranged with one of the best-known lithographers for a series of correct representations from this film in the way of lithograph posters. State right buyers of this production will undoubtedly get the best results by only getting this authentic paper, which they may do by arrangement with the Eclectic Film Company. The question of suitable posters is one that does not always receive the attention it should from exhibitors. For a well-known subject like the above, there will undoubtedly be posters made by outside concerns and these may not always be correct representations of this well-known production, in which case they may do more harm than good. As a matter of fact, the Eclectic Film Company is warning all State right owners against unauthorized posters that are being offered on this subject.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN

IT is good to see the pipe-organists coming to the front with ideas and suggestions concerning this noble instrument considered as an accompaniment to moving pictures. Here is a communication from Thomas Bruce, of the Princess Theater, Everett, Washington, which is worthy of consideration not only by organists, but orchestra leaders as well:

> I am glad to see the interest in organ music for the picture picking up, as in the West here all the best houses have pipe-organs, and in answer to some of your questions, I am giving my opinions.
> One must be able to improvise to interpret pictures properly—I do not mean that four or five reels should be improvised through entirely, for I believe that if we could bring back Wagner, Chopin, Beethoven or any of the masters and have them work in a picture show for six or seven hours a day, even their improvisations would become monotonous; it's the endless grind and it will become a grind to the best of them.
> In the same way all popular or all classical music becomes tiresome if used exclusively, therefore the "happy medium" is some of each, and improvise in the places where you have nothing that fits. A picture interpreter must have an unlimited repertoire and know how to use it, and in all cases play what the picture requires, whether it be "Beethoven's Funeral March," "The Doxology," "Home Sweet Home," or "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine." For instance, in some Italian pictures I use "Lucia," "Rigoletto," or "Cavaleria Rusticanna;" in others I use "Cirribirribin," "Rose Marie," or "That's Italian Love" and in comedy probably "Mariutch," "My Brudder Sylvest," or "Finiculli-Finiculla." There is nothing characteristically Italian about "Mariutch" or "My Brudder Sylvest," but to those who know the songs, they may seem very appropriate, and to those who do not know them they are as appropriate as anything else could be. A good picture interpreter would never think of ending the music simply because he had reached the end of the number; to do so would spoil the effect of the picture. He would not even play the ending of the number if it did not fit the action of the play. I have known of concert organists engaged in picture work who were not successful simply because they played good concert programs regardless of the picture being shown. Probably one person out of fifty knew what they were playing or appreciated the concerts, and I doubt if those who did were pleased at the finale of an overture coming while a pathetic scene was being enacted. The organists were of the super-musical breed who think that, to play a popular number or rag on the organ, cheapens the instrument. There are, however, some good rags and are excellently played on a pipe-organ, but it takes a good musician to play them and get the right harmony, instrumentation and arrangement. I have heard very few picture-show orchestras who did not play some ragtime during a program—then why not on the organ?
> Pipe-organs have been so long associated with churches that some people cannot see that anything but serious music should be used; they will learn though.
> Recently we had "Ivanhoe" and I will give an idea as to how I played for it on the organ.
> For the opening scenes, the waltz from "Robin Hood." At Gurth's appearance, changed to pastoral from "William Tell," using this as the Gurth motif. At Ivanhoe's appearance as the Palmer, the "Pilgrims Chorus" from "Thanhauser," using this as the Ivanhoe motif. At Prince John's entrance, a few measures of martial music on the order of introduction to "Light Cavalry." A light waltz until the Palmer compels Prince John to drink to the health of Richard the Lion Hearted, then four measures of triumphal march from "Aida," using this as the motif for Richard. Then "Pilgrims Chorus" softly until the entrance of Isaac of York and Rebecca. "Agitato" when Knight insults Rebecca and through next few scenes until Ivanhoe removes Palmer's robe, then "Pilgrims Chorus" full organ until end of reel. Of course, "Pilgrims Chorus" had to be repeated but I played it in different keys so as not to become monotonous—the mediant and sub-mediant being excellent for this.
> In the second part I used "October Ale" from "Robin Hood" for the Robin Hood scenes, and at the Black Knight's (Richard the Lion Heartered), appearance, march from "Aida." For the last part of two and part three, the fast movements from "Poet and Peasant" and the storm scene from "William Tell." Also some dramatic music.

Orchestra of the American Theater, Salt Lake City, Utah.

> For the last part I played mostly minor strains (improvising), until Isaac's speech "I Have Found a Champion;" then "Pilgrims Chorus" until Ivanhoe's entrance; then full organ. "Agitato through the fight—then march from "Aida" as King Richard knights Ivanhoe. Then pathetic pp until end.

I have compared this with the "Ivanhoe" picture and will say it appeals to me as being an excellent musical accompaniment which can be made to apply to orchestra work and piano alone as well as the organ. I like Mr. Bruce's idea of using a motif for the leading characters when it can be consistently done—as is the case in pictures like "Ivanhoe." This idea will undoubtedly play an important part in correct picture music of the future.

Organ Music a Feature.

The following, from Mr. J. J. Blood, Galveston, Texas, speaks for itself:

> I wish to thank you for the very interesting and instructive answer to my inquiry on pipe-organ music for picture theaters. You will see by enclosed programs that I am making a specialty of my work in this direction. I change programs every day and have many requests for opera and classical excerpts and find that the taste of picture house patrons is not as depraved as many strict (?) musicians would have us believe.

Organist, J. J. Blood.

Requests for special musical numbers cheerfully granted. Send requests to organist, or leave at box-office.

The writer enclosed several other programs, but they did not give the titles of the pictures which they accompanied. These programs are a printed form 8 inches by 8½, space being allowed for the program which is typed in. They are displayed in a neat frame in front of the theater.

"Violin" Pictures.

A communication has reached me in which the writer bitterly arraigns one of the leading producers for not engaging a violinist in preference to an actor to play one of the characters in a "violin" picture released not long ago. The complainant urges that the actor in question did not know how to hold his instrument, and that this imperfection was very apparent to those observers who knew something about violin playing. Criticisms of this nature do not properly come under the head of "music for the picture," though I confess to having been guilty of it once or twice in the past. No other instrument will betray the lack of knowledge of the player so much as the violin. There is a correct way of holding the instrument, the bow, the elbows and hands, and nobody can imitate these positions unless he has given a little time to their study. As to employing musicians to play such parts, the proposition is absurd. Given the choice between an actor who couldn't fiddle and a fiddler who couldn't act there is no question as to which is the more acceptable. A few hours practice under the instruction of a violinist will give an actor the proper poise if he tries. I know, for I had the pleasure of once coaching an actor for a part of this kind who, after one hour's practice, gave a very passable imitation and the picture apparently showed a musician who could play the violin. Technical faults such as the one noted are not nearly so common as they were a few years ago. Numbers of pictures have been shown in recent years portraying violinists who, if they couldn't play, at least knew how to imitate a player.

Eye Strain.

"I notice the subject of 'eye strain' has to come up about every so often. I wonder why some of these critics don't get in touch with operators and musicians if they want data on which to base their arguments. They ought to know something about it, but have you ever heard any serious complaint from one of these? I have been playing the pictures for five years (piano) and am looking pretty steadily at pictures several hours a day. I cannot say I have noticed any 'eye strain' as yet.—C. J. Lukins."

It is a fact that operators and musicians must look at the pictures a great deal longer and steadier than the patrons of the theater. I cannot speak for operators, but from my own observation there is none of this so-called "eye strain" to be found among musicians. True, the eyes may become fatigued if used too long without rest, but the same may result from prolonged reading or writing. For my part the only eye strain I have ever experienced came from looking at some of the "bum" plots as portrayed on the screen. Happily, they are getting fewer; perhaps to Mr. Sargent is due considerable credit for this improvement.

A New Book.

I am in receipt of a booklet published by E. A. Ahern, entitled: "What and How to Play for Pictures." Though the work in spots shows evidence of haste in construction, the ideas are sound and will commend themselves to readers who have followed this department and contributed to the same. Mr. Ahern does not profess to offer any new or startling theories, but a modest little pamphlet compact in form and containing much common sense. In support of his contentions he quotes liberally from the Moving Picture World and other papers. The author is an experienced picture pianist and "What and How to Play for Pictures" gives us his ideas as worked out before the screen.

Improvising.

A letter from New Orleans contains this among other things: "Which is the best way of playing for the pictures—improvising, or playing from music?"

It depends upon which you can do the better. The term "improvising," as applied to picture work, is usually a misnomer. The more successful players of this type, whom it has been my good fortune to hear, depended upon their memories rather than their inventive abilities, playing whole or parts of various compositions interspersed with chords, modulations, phrases and sometimes whole strains of an original theme, joining the whole fabric together like mortar between the bricks. When this is done cleverly the effect is pleasing and satisfactory. Otherwise it is not. It is unnecessary to say that this is almost impossible in an orchestra unless the pianist fills up the "chinks."

NEW ENGLAND PICTURE PERSONALITIES.

Mr. Louis Machat, vice-president and general manager of the Standard Feature Film Company of Boston, has pushed ahead with remarkable speed, due to his energy and ability. In 1911 Mr. Machat and his associates bought out the old Cameraphone Company, of New York, and showed those pictures in New York houses. In December, 1911, Mr. Machat opened the Bermuda Opera House at Hamilton, Bermuda, and later sold his interests there. Then he went to Boston, where he started in the feature end of the business by purchasing "Satan," under the name of the Machat Feature Film Company. This proved a good move on Mr. Machat's part, and the business quickly grew, until now a new feature is bought each week.

In August, 1912, the firm name was changed to the Standard Feature Film Company, with offices at 665 Washington Street, Boston. The Paradise Theater, Boston, was bought by Mr. Machat in March, 1913, and is run as a first-class photoplay house. A very busy man is Mr. Machat, between his exchange and his theater, but by keeping everlastingly at it, he has no difficulty in attending to both. "Quality is my only master" is his slogan in buying features, and New England exhibitors evidently appreciate this grade of film, to judge by Mr. Machat's increasing business.

GERMAN LETTER.

(Special Correspondence to The World.)

THERE seems to be a distinct reaction in this country against the features of too great length. A number of producers have conferred with a view to arriving at a standard length of feature films, and it is believed that hereafter few multiple reel features will exceed 3000 feet. The features based on popular fiction are still in high favor among the patrons of motion picture theaters. Such leaders of German literature as Paul Lindau and Han Heins Ewers have received large sums of money for the filming privilege of their most popular stories.

Recently the Union, which is the most prosperous film producing enterprise in Germany, has opened two very large theaters in Berlin. In one of these theaters, which has been named the Union Theater, Max Reinhart's feature, "The Isle of the Blessed," was exhibited for the first time in Germany. It was on the whole well received though there were some unfavorable comments, too.

The German courts are kept busy straightening out the litigation between the Pasquali and Ambrosio firms as to their rights to the title "The Last Days of Pompeii." The litigation is conducted with considerable bitterness, and so far the Ambrosio seem to have much the best of it.

Mr. Leon Gaumont has now established a special rental branch for Germany, which is known as the German Gaumont Company. He has acquired a number of exchanges and will hereafter operate his own rental exchanges, without, however, stopping the sale of his film.

The Great Northern Film Company has decided hereafter to rent directly to the exhibitors. It is expected that the Vitascope Company will follow this system and that after a short time most of the producers in Germany will try to rent directly to the exhibitors.

At the coming session of the Reischstag, a new licensing law for moving picture theaters, will be introduced, and it is generally expected that it will pass. While opinions as to the exact effect of this new legislation differ even within the ranks of the industry, it is generally admitted that the police supervision of the theaters will be more severe than ever in case the bill is enacted into a law.

BRITISH NOTES.

(Special Correspondence to The World.)

B. NICHOLLS, one of the managers of the Moving Picture Sales Agency, of London, has left for a short business tour to New York. Another well-known gentleman in the trade who has temporarily forsaken this country is Mr. Goldgraber, of the "Big A Film Co.," who, it is stated, is also on the lookout for new exclusives.

Unless there is to be some modification by film manufacturers of the excessive "padding" so noticeable in several recent feature films, there will be a general trade outcry in this country. As a typical instance the case of a Yorkshire firm of film-renters may be cited. They recently bought up territorial rights for a ten-thousand footer entitled "The Three Musketeers," produced after the novel by Dumas by a Continental firm of good repute. Almost the first thing the renters in question did was to subject the picture to a thorough shrinking, in fact, no less than 2000 feet were cut out.

Sir H. B. Tree, the actor-knight who has recently made arrangements for the filming of "Joseph and His Brethren," the much discussed Bible drama, pays a high tribute to the potentialities of the moving picture. "So far as the realistic drama is concerned," he states, "the stage must always be a thousand years behind the cinema."

I referred some weeks ago to the success of the American production "The Battle of Gettysburg." The appreciation of the British public for this class of film cannot be disputed in view of the fact this subject has appeared in nearly 350 different towns and at as many as eight to a dozen theaters in some. With the exception of the Vitagraph Co.'s "Wild Beasts at Large," I should pronounce it the most successful film of recent months. Another very successful picture is "Under Two Flags." It is to be re-issued in this country by the Western Import Co. next month.

The Union Film Publishing Co. is the newest recruit to the ranks of the manufacturers on this side of the Atlantic. The particular territory of the new producers seems to be the Scottish highlands with its romantic scenery and associations. During the past week or two a company has been working quietly on a costume drama somewhere in the northern wilds. Their studios are, however, for the sake of convenience, in London.

A controversy has been precipitated in the western counties of England by the action of the chief constable of Bristol in attempting to suppress the distribution of money to picture theater patrons. In several places the distribution of sweets to children has been discontinued but at a few places I know of, the management distribute tea and tobacco to visitors over fifty years of age.

What I think I might aptly denominate the two leading British films of the month are Shakespeare's master tragedy "Macbeth," filmed partly at Heidelburg and partly at Sir H. Herkomer's studio at Bushey and Sir Chas. Wyndham's version of "David Garrick." Both these will be seen in the United States before long. The former has been purchased for this country by Mr. A. E. Abrahams, of Stratford, and features Mr. Arthur Bouchier and Miss Violet Vanburgh. Owing to the indisposition of Sir Chas. Wyndham it may be a few months before "David Garrick" is seen in the U. S. A. J. B. SUTCLIFFE.

PARIS LETTER.

(Special Correspondence to The World.)

THE most important event in moving picture circles, since I last wrote, is the announcement that the Cines Company has decided to place its films on the open market in France. Hitherto Louis Aubert—proprietor of one of the two great renting houses of Paris—has acted as sole concessionnaire for Cines productions. From 21st of November onwards, Cines films will be sold to one and all from the company's offices, 8 rue Saint Augustin. Extraordinary features which have envolved the expenditure of large sums of money such as "Quo Vadis?" will, however, be exploited exclusively by the firm. Monsieur Mario Serra has come from the head offices at Rome, to take charge of the Paris branch.

This move of the Cines Company is an important one from all points of view. It will undoubtedly help to improve the working conditions of the French moving picture industry which, in the opinion of most people, is the poorest in the world. The industry is weak primarily because, in the past, competition has been stifled.

Robert Schwobthaler, who took moving pictures on the firing line with the Greek army, has many stories to tell of his adventures at the front. One day a Bulgarian spy was brought into camp. Seeing the cameraman standing by his camera, the spy immediately folded his arms and fell on his knees, thinking he was about to be shot by some new shooting apparatus. Mr. Schwobthaler says his knowledge of English was of most use to him because of the vast number of Greek soldiers who had come from America to fight for their country.

Gaumont's big production "A Child of Paris," proved so popular at the Gaumont Palace Hippodrome that it was decided to exhibit the film for another seven days. The same week Pathe's "Germinal" met with a similar reception and was in the bill at the Cirque d 'Hiver (Cinema Pathe), for two weeks. To see two films being shown contemporaneously for more than a week is something quite unusual here.

Joseph Menchen has purchased the British rights of the Jeff Smith-Carpentier fight film. The boxing match took place on October 11th, at Luna Park.

For the first time sketches of "fashions at the picture theater" have been printed in a Paris daily—the "Eclair." The lucky house to be so honored was the Casino de Paris and the occasion, that of the Premiere of the "Three Musketeers." This film is still being exhibited by Jacques Munoz. In its original state it was too long so some cutting had to be done to comply with the public's taste.

Speaking to a well known film man here, I was told that the long film is far from becoming a thing of the past.

A company secured permission to take moving pictures in the hall of the French House of Commons. But the members strongly objected to pose before the cameras. Nothing daunted the cinematographers stage-managed a regular sitting in the Chamber itself. A number of artists were made up as the leading French political men.

The Quo Vadis Films Company, of London, has opened a branch at Lyon for the exploitation of its "Quo Vadis?" film. The picture is to be released this month.

On October 31st, the Grands Films Popularies will issue another important dramatic subject entitled "Le Fils de Lagardere." Monsieur Ravet and Mlle. Berte Boyy, both of the Comedie Francaise, take the principal roles.

H. de Ruyter is presenting the Kinotfilm of Vienna and Vay and Hubert, Milan.

A new firm, the Film Parisien, will release its first production "The Fatal Mask," on December 19th. It is a 2,800 foot drama. This is to be followed by a comedy featuring Jeanne Bloch, the famous Parisian low comedienne. Mr. George, late of Raleigh and Roberts, directs the company.

The man who opened the Kosmorama on the Boulevard Poissoniere once boasted that he could pack any house with an exclusive picture. He ran exclusives—and good ones—for twelve months or so, but in spite of ambitious publicity campaigns, resolved to close down at the finish of last season. In effect the hall has been taken over by Pathé Freres. Alterations have been effected and the place is now being run as an all topical picture theater, along the lines of the Pathe Journal cinema, about which I have already written. Success seems certain for the new venture for the Kosmorama is better located than the first motion picture news hall. Uniform entrance price is ten cents.

Charles Urban has acquired the moving picture rights of Helene Gingold's tragedy "Abelard and Heloise." The play will be shown in Kinemacolor for the first time at the Edouard VII theater. The opening of this theater has been delayed and the exact date has not yet been announced.

The Vitagraph Company is spending something like $100,000.00 on the new works now in course of construction outside Paris. No money is being spared to make the vast army of workpeople as comfortable as possible. Paris is the head European distributing center for Vitagraph films.

The mayor of Lille has announced that his decree, prohibiting the use of any but non-flam films in picture theaters, will come into force on March 1st, 1914. The mayor has asked a firm (understood to be Pathé Freres), whether it will be in a position to supply non-flam films by that date. The mayor of Lyon has passed a regulation to the same effect which will be ratified in October next year. Messrs. Pathé Freres gave a demonstration of their acetate non-flam film before the prefect of police this month.

Aubert announced that he intended to take proceedings directly against exhibitors showing any film which infringed the copyright of the Photo Drama Co.'s picture "Last Days of Pompeii."

Lotteries.

IT ISN'T so very long ago that we published a letter from Hay and Nicholas on the lottery laws, and right on top of that we advocated a scheme that seemed to be entirely within the pale and which New York lawyers pronounced to be within the limits of safety, yet the New York post office declared the scheme to be a lottery and the decision was sustained on a reference to the Attorney General's office. Later another scheme was submitted to the post office. It did not involve the passage of any money or other valuable consideration other than the opening and examination of the contents of an envelope, and yet this, too, was pronounced a violation of the lottery law. It would seem that this was sadly straining the point, but this is unimportant. The important fact is that the United State postal regulations, which are based on the interpretation of the Federal law, are stringent in the extreme; so stringent, indeed, that most gift schemes come under the ban if the slightest element of chance determines the distribution of the gifts It may be that you can run a dozen or a hundred of these schemes without interference, but you cannot tell at what moment the attention of the legal officers wi'l be directed to your case and you will be brought before the bar. The latest decision we have been given leads us to repeat our recent warning and to suggest that some ruling be had on every scheme in which one patron or prospective patron is favored above another.

Gift distributions in which every patron is treated alike seem to be within the law, but the moment the element of chance enters in any way whatever, the scheme should be regarded with suspicion and not put into use until an authoritative decision is had. This applies with double force where the scheme is more or less dependent upon the use of the mails, whether through the employment of a newspaper advertisement or circularization by mail The local prosecutor may be inclined to take things easy, but the post office inspectors are always on the alert.

Going Into Details.

About the most complete booklet on a new house that has come to our attention is sent from Green Bay, Wisconsin, where Henry Goldman has opened the Colonial Theater. It is a sixteen-page and cover affair in compact type that treats of every phase of the house from the Mirror screen to the concrete floor, the plan of management and the minor conveniences, such as a public telephone for the patrons and hat and hair pins for the women. The facts are stated with an air of pride, but modestly and without flamboyant exaggeration. No one is led to disbelieve the statements through excessive claims. Every line reads convincingly and honestly and every paragraph adds to your conviction that the Colonial is going to be the house pre-eminent—which would not be such a bad line for Mr. Goldman to adopt. The scheme may not be new to others, but it strikes us as a novelty that on Sundays and holidays two complete programs will be run, the reels run in the afternoon giving place at six o'clock to an entirely different set. In a comparatively small town with few attractions we think that there are many patrons who will be glad to see two performances, provided that there is a change of bill.

One morning each week is to be set aside as visiting day, when the house staff will conduct any visitor over the place from screen to projecting room. It is a capital idea for it enables the fireproof devices to be shown without placing undue emphasis upon them, and at the same time gives the patron a feeling of intimate acquaintance and security.

To "cover up" possible typographical errors, the last page carries this announcement:

> In reading over this little Booklet, detect the misspelled words and arrange them into a sentence. Return this Booklet in good condition with the sentence you have originated and receive as a reward as many complimentary passes to the Colonial as misspelled words in the sentence you have formed. Contest open to adults only. We reserve the right to withdraw this offer at any time, after giving notice of same.

A man who can get out so good a booklet should be able to write good general advertising, but Mr. Goldman is notified that we are from Missouri and would like to be shown.

Perhaps He Does.

From Aberdeen, S. D., comes a gray envelope with no other printing than the line:

IF HE BUT KNEW

After this curiosity getter you open the cover and find inside the regular herald of Imp's Ivanhoe and on a heavy card this text:

> IF SIR WALTER SCOTT BUT KNEW
> That nearly 100 years after Ivanhoe was written it would be presented to the world in photoplay drama, correctly staged and costumed, by a great company of artists, he would have some idea of the progress of the world since his day.
> The modern photoplay is one of the great wonders of the age, and "Ivanhoe," as shown at the Idle Hour, Monday and Tuesday October 20th and 21st, is the most elaborate film produced to date.
> In order to accommodate all who will want to see "Ivanhoe," the management has decided to run continuously from 2:30 until 10:30 p. m.

The idea is an excellent one and does credit to C. T Smithers. It is applicable to any of the big productions of standard fiction or drama and the changes may be rung to suit the circumstance and the taste of the particular clientele catered to, but a scheme such as this will make its greater appeal to the more intelligent and the matter should be prepared with taste, following Mr. Smither's lead. This is no copy for a yellow and red envelope The black on gray is much better and the composition of the card should match the quiet tone of the envelope.

The Kerrigan Theater.

H. H Legg, of the Kerrigan Theater, New Albany, Ind., sends a photograph of the new house, which seats 1,000 persons, and adds that he has been a constant reader of this paper ever since the formation of the New Albany Amusement Company, Inc., and finds it a great help.

For the opening performance he distributed really handsome sachet folders with the wish:

May the fragrance of this Souvenir remind you always of the elegance and comfort of the Kerrigan

Most of the matter is clipped or adapted from these pages. A local reel was the opening feature and "The Prisoner of Zenda" followed. The one thing we do not like is a line at the bottom of the Zenda herald which states that owing to the extra cost of that subject green trading stamps cannot be given "as usual." For the love of Heaven, why should green trading stamps be given at any time? It is possible to offer a program that does not need this grocery store adjunct. We hope to hear that the plan has been abandoned.

Star Stuff.

H. R. Weber, of the Star Theater, Chambersburg, Pa., writes:

> All the advertising for this theater is done through three daily newspapers and a generous use of posters I am submitting several clippings to show the style of reader ad I use, trying at all times to use a catchy line or saying to keep people looking for the ad every day, which I find that they do. A good many original things I find in your advertising page and in the advertisements, all of which I use. When advertising films I go generally by the "Comments On the Films" as well as the manufacturers' advertisements. The exhibitor who is not getting the World and benefiting himself by it is the kind of competitor I would like to have.

We have used a number of Mr Weber's advertisements from time to time, though lately he has been keeping as silent as Carl M. Chapin and

N. E. Chaney. He likes the reading advertisement with the star sunk into the first paragraph. We reproduce some of his paragraphs, the first evidently being a paraphrase of Mr. Langdon's census advertisement.

> Don't tell anyone about this.
> Out of 13,000 people in this town only 7,500 came to see our show last week. This leaves 5,500 to account for. Up to late last night none of them have come around to explain their absence.
> Do you think that what Barnum said has had anything to do with it? We have concluded that most of the 5,500 didn't know how good the show is. Now the show is good, and every day it is getting better, and while we don't do a lot of boasting about it, the fact remains that you are missing a deuce of a lot of good things every night that you are not at the Star.
> When a miner goes to work he has his pick, but not his choice. With us it's different; we dig deep down into our pockets and pay more for our pictures, and then we take the pick and choice of the world's best productions. The pictures with real plots, devised by the brightest brains in the motion picture business—always a clean program of vivid gripping interest. Let us prove it to you tonight.
> Our motto has always been, "The Most of the Best for the Least Money." To please our patrons pleases us; that's why everybody's happy. Better join the happy family tonight and see—
> ALL ALONE IN THIS TOWN
> Nobody nowhere is getting from anybody anywhere better photoplays than we are projecting right here in this town every evening at the STAR Theater. Our contract requires and exacts the very latest and best pictures—most novel, original, artistic and entertaining—and you can prove it any evening by seeing for yourself. Tonight's the time to try it.
> Every Little Bit of Better Added to the Best, Makes the Best a Little Bit Better.
> If the best is what you prefer—we are here to show you.
> Blue Beard killed his wives, it is said, with a cleaver; we killed the long waits between the reels long ago by installing two machines. And it's true that you can see more at this theater in less time, for less money, than anywhere else. If old Procrastination is stealing any of your time, why don't you spend it where you get the most for your half dime. A great program tonight.

A Portable Cabin.

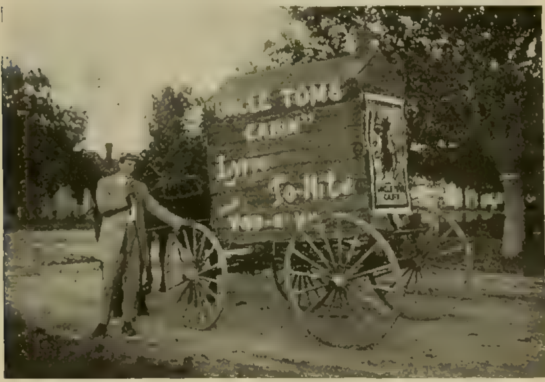
Leonard and Eakins, of the Lyric Theater, Sterling, Col., send a picture of a wagon float that they used for the recent Imp Uncle Tom's Cabin release. This cabin was made on a frame with sized muslin and after doing service around town all day was taken off the wagon and used as a front attraction in the evening, making one investment do double service.



Nothing seems to attract more attention than a float, particularly if a noise maker is concealed inside, no matter if it be merely a boy with a drum or a bar of iron and a mallet. The management points out that some of the words are purposely misspelled to attract attention, though this would seem to be self-explanatory. There is some kink in the make-up of the average mind that impells one to notice the faults, and used in moderation, the scheme is a good one, particularly in this case, where the log cabin seems almost to call for rough lettering and a misuse of words. It may help others to frame an advertisement, either for this reel or something else.

Can't Scare Wesley.

Wesley woke up at last and sends in a dodger that states:

> If I should stop to think how I can give a show with ten girls and four comedians, two acts of vaudeville and five reels of pictures for ten and twenty cents, I would be scared.

We refuse to believe it after looking at a portrait cut that makes him look like the star tenor of the Black Patti troubadours. Any man who will overwork a cut like that will scare at nothing. The one bad thing about Wesley (who is the man that "says so") is that he will run vaudeville, but a troupe of fourteen is some little lot for a picture house and he sends in a very fetching advertisement. Now that he has learned our address again perhaps he'll send in some picture advertising in his old-time style. At any rate he still lives, and we were beginning to doubt that.

Coming Edisons.

So many have written to know why we dropped the advance Edison "dope" we asked Mr. Plimpton to renew the stuff which somehow got dropped. There is a mighty good railroad drama coming October 14th, based, perhaps, on recent happenings of an eastern road, but applicable to all parts of the country. It is Phantom Signals and deals with a railroad president who pays the price of his economies. The Doctor's Duty, released on the 11th, is not unlike the Doctor's Dilemma, but offers a more dramatic presentation of the subject, and Tommy's Stratagem, dated for the 4th, is a capital kid story told with all of the Edison charm. Archie and the Bell Boy is a juvenile of quite another character, coming out on the 5th, and A Woodland Paradise, by Miss Mary Fuller, dated for the 1st, will appeal to all "Mary" admirers. These are all more than deserving of a program place. See that they come along.

Naturally Not Satisfied.

J. R. Baxter, of the Opera House, Spring City, Utah, sends in a two-week program of four pages and says that he is not quite satisfied with number one. We do not think that we personally would be satisfied with a two weeks' program that had three Wednesdays in it and we never did see any Wednesdays that came on the first and third of the same month. We do not blame him for intimating that the printer might possibly have done better. Just as a matter of fact the printer seems to have done his worst, but the idea is good, and right at the start Mr. Baxter strikes the personal note that is the best feature of these house organs. The entire four pages are pervaded with the suggestion that he wants to give his patrons the very best time possible and that he wants them to help toward that end. That's the proper way to go at it. Make the people feel that you're unhappy if they do not enjoy the show and they'll do their best to be happy to save you from unhappiness—always provided that you do not overdo the stunt and suggest to your readers that you are writing the stuff merely to get business. Mr. Baxter speaks convincingly and with just the right emphasis.

If he goes into executive sessions with the printer, we would suggest that he has that third page set as job work instead of straight composition. In other words, the program should be made an advertisement in tabulated form and not a reading notice. The different dates should be more strongly marked, and some full face type will help a lot. Since there are but three reels and three changes a week, it will be possible to display a two weeks' program on the single page without crowding, since the titles alone are used.

Mr. Baxter is headed in on the right track and when he and the foreman of the composing room get to know each other better—and a cigar and a few passes will help a lot toward this end, the Opera House Times will look better. We would like to see later issues.

Hilson-Halleck.

H. T. Gardner, of the Lyric Theater, Holdenville, Okla., seems to have found a new one. The other day Holdenvillas—if that is the way to put it—got a wedding announcement in their morning mail that read—and not in Old English, but in eighteen and twenty-four point Typo Upright—to this effect:

Mr. and Mrs. James B. Hilson request the honor of your presence at the marriage of their daughter
Anna
to
Mr. Harry Halleck
on Thursday evening, October second nineteen hundred and thirteen half past seven
at Lyric Theater
Holdenville

and in the corner, in six-point Gothic was

At home
After October Third
211 West Second St.
Oklahoma City

It was precisely the sort of thing that the best families of Holdenville put out when papa shoves daughter's support off on to someone else, but the best families never heard of the Hilsons or the Hallecks, and so they looked the matter up to find that it was an advertising dodge for the Kalem two-reel "The Fatal Legacy." After that they knew that the Lyric was going to have that two-reel—and most of them attended the marriage.

The scheme will hardly work in a large town, but it is one very pretty piece of advertising work in a small town. Send an invitation to Mr. Gardner when you use the scheme, just to show your appreciation, and don't use the scheme unless you can put the invitations out in such a shape that every person who gets one will groan at the idea of having to buy another wedding present. This sort of thing is only good when it is done up in the proper style as Mr. Gardner has done it. And just because it is an invitation don't let the printer ring in Old English on you. He may have to use the type up on someone, but refuse to sit with the goats.

The Dream Is Over.

N. H. Gibbons, who owns and manages the Aurora and Grand Theaters, Lawrence, Kansas, is back from his honeymoon, which went as far as the Pacific Coast, and is once more managing the houses himself. Now we suppose he'll cut out the "Who Will Marry Mary" series since the matter no longer interests him. Here are congratulations and good wishes. We would have used the photograph that accompanies the announcement had it shown something more recent than two-year-old attractions. We are always glad to run photographs, but they must be up to date.

By the Way.

And by the way, do you encourage your patrons to become fans or do you discourage their interest in the particular players? Be willing to tell the casts if you know them and, if you do not, write to the Inquiries and we'll be glad to give you all the help we can. It all helps to make business. It may bother you a little, but it doesn't give you much bother to bank money and so you should be willing to take a little trouble to insure banking a lot.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by Epes Winthrop Sargent

Some Dints and Developing.

EVERY little while someone tells that there is no money in writing photoplays, and we smile and remember how many utter idiots there are who think they are writing plays.

A photoplay is not something to be scribbled in a hurry. It is something to be thought out, to be developed gradually, to be built up not merely dashed off. In a word you must write with your brains, and use your intelligence if you have any. Mostly intelligence seems to be lacking

The other day Mrs. Brandon wrote that she was in the market for two-reel Western dramas. Later she wrote she had enough, and added a request that certain other styles of stories she wanted be sent to the New York office of the company. This last request was due to the fact that so many of the scripts were sent to Fort Lee, where the studios are located, and where, for a time, the script bureau also was run.

Some time since the address was changed to New York and that address has appeared on all recent address slips sent out from this office, but the average author read Eclair, two-reel scripts and rushed off to send in a couple without pausing to be reminded of the change of address. And most of the scripts came back, because they were written in the same slap dash fashion.

It is the little things that count, because they argue care in the greater things as well. It does not follow that a fully paid script is a good one, but almost invariably it is found that the under-stamped script is a poor one, because the same lack of care that causes the author to guess at the postal rate shows in the preparation of the story.

If you have intelligence, cultivate and use it Do not stamp yourself with the earmarks of the unintelligent through lack of care. Try to convince the editor that you know what you are doing and your script will be read with a bias in your favor, but more than one veteran will throw out the script with a postage due stamp on the envelope, because long experience has shown that not once in a thousand times is a script so cursed worthy of consideration.

Paste this somewhere as a list of things to avoid

Fully prepay postage by putting a proper number of stamps on the going envelope. Have it weighed. Don't guess.

Do not inclose loose stamps for return, but supply a suitable return envelope, properly and legibly addressed to yourself, with at least one two cent stamp fully and firmly fastened to the same.

Do not add a one cent stamp if the letter is over one ounce and under one ounce and a half. The letter postage is two cents for each ounce or fraction.

Do not tell the editor to destroy the script if it is worthless. Get it back.

Do not ask information or advice without inclosing a return envelope properly stamped and addressed.

Do not think that to send the envelope with the flap unsealed makes it third-class matter. If it is a script it costs two cents an ounce or fraction, whether sealed or not.

Do not send a carbon or an original on thin paper.

Do not use up odd sizes of paper. Get the regulation size and use the odd size stuff for practice work.

Do not send a script and an accompanying letter in separate envelopes.

Do not query a script a week after sending.

Do not send out a single sheet of paper, whether script or letter, that does not carry your name and address in full.

These few remarks will be enough for this time, but there are other don'ts almost as important. Think them out for yourself.

Eclair Has Enough, But—

Mrs. F. Marion Brandon writes that the recent statement of the Eclair wants in this department has brought her more than a sufficiency of Western two-reel scripts. She writes:

> In your next issue will you kindly thank the authors who submitted their Western, Mexican and mining scripts in answer to our call, and state that we have purchased enough to carry us through the next few months.
> We will, however, be very glad to receive split reel comedies, bordering on the burlesque; and modern dramas of two or three reels—providing these are departures from the conventional in photoplays.
> Authors who have not three releases to their credit are advised to save their stamps. Authors who send in their scripts are requested to kindly inclose return stamps Even the best of them overlook this really important detail. The best index to our requirements can be obtained by watching Eclair releases.

She adds as a footnote that scripts should be sent to 225 West 42nd Street, and not to the studio, which is precisely what we said the first time, but it seems that some persons who read cannot think. If you are told to send scripts to a New York address, why not note that fact and refrain from sending them to New Jersey?

That Cines Contest.

A long time ago we announced that the Cines Company would hold a photoplay contest and that particulars would be announced later. We know that some people think that we are what politicians call each other, but we could not give the particulars until they were given out and the particulars have just come to hand. We give the circular in full:

> The Italian Society "Cines," of Rome, is studying the strongly educative influence of the cinematograph on the people with a view to elevating its productions and has decided to open an international competition for cinematograph dramas with prizes of considerable value. The Honorable Ferdinando Martini, Prof. Albert Besnard, Director of the French Academy at Rome, and the Honorable Vittorio Emanuele Orlando have accepted appointments to the commission, on which will figure the names of the most conspicuous personalities in the world of Art and Letters of different countries. In this manner the greatest talents will write in friendly rivalry to inquire into the requisites of the "Model" cinematograph capable of having an advantageous influence on manners and tastes, provided they answer to the exigencies of Art.
> The prizes which will be awarded by the Society "Cines" are as follows:
> | | | |
> |---|---|---|
> | 1st | Frs. | 25,000 |
> | 2nd | " | 5,000 |
> | 3rd | " | 2,500 |
> | 4th | " | 1,000 |
> | 5th | " | 500 |
> Other prizes of 100 Francs will be awarded as arranged in the conditions.
> The competition will be opened in the first days of November, 1913, and will close on April 30, 1914.
> All those desiring to compete can demand the conditions of the competition from the direction of Italian Society "Cines," 51 Via Macerata, Rome.

And in sending in for particulars remember that the request should be accompanied by a return envelope and an international reply coupon, to be had at any post office for six cents Remember also that while letters may now be sent to certain parts of Europe for two cents, the postal rate to Italy is five cents, and put that much on your letter.

Eyes That See Not.

Get your yard stick fixed up so that your script will measure full value. Junk is being put out in two thousand feet lengths, and by many this is accepted as the proper standard.

We have just sent back to a lady three scripts. Two were in five scenes each and the third in six. She "heard" that someone had advertised for prize scripts, so she sent these to this paper instead of the advertiser. As a matter of fact an enterprising but misinformed person had advertised for lists of successful plays, hoping by this means to test the temper of American audiences to guide him in the selection of films for abroad. He did not advertise for plays, but this correspondent sits down, dashes off three scripts, sends them in and sits down to wait to collect. She did not even take the trouble to type two of the stories because she wrote them rather late at night.

That's the trouble with nine-tenths of the persons who are frittering away their time writing plays. They "dash off" a lot of rot, are "too busy" to send it out in proper form, and when they get rejection after rejection, they decide that it takes a pull to sell a play.

It doesn't take pull. It takes pains. The writer of this department sells a lot of plays, not because he is on this paper, but in spite of that fact. Some frank remarks at various times have closed two-thirds of the market to him. Of the other third he sells to some of the companies merely because he can write plays that the director does not have to work over for a day in order to line up the incident properly. The script can be taken and the production made from that. That is not pull. It's work. You can sell plays if you can deliver the goods, but you must first be able to deliver the goods, and you can't deliver the goods if you send in five-scene plays, scripts in longhand or do any of the other fool things that get the editorial goats. Use your eyes and your brains. That's the secret of selling scripts.

Full Weight Scripts.

One of the most intelligent of the foreign handlers of film writes:

> The sale of American product has dropped off considerably in this country (England) and on the Continent. This is due to exhibitors running exclusive film and filling in with commercial. The exclusives they are running are largely of European make, and when it comes to long films the European maker seems to do better work than the American producer. The difficulty with the American subjects is that so many of them have not got sufficient material to warrant their length.

To put it into plainer language, the American sale is falling off in the world market because the stories are not good enough. The profit comes from these extra sales, and as soon as the American manufacturer realizes that he is not getting this sale, something is going to drop on the two reel end, and what is going to drop is the incompetent author whether he has a large reputation or no literary repute whatever. If you happen to be hanging around just then with some good two reel stuff it's mighty likely that you'll be able to make some sales.

To be explicit, the average author is not making good on two reel stuff and is overapt to pad out the material, arguing that if there is plenty of lively movement the lack of plot will pass unnoticed. One editor writes:

> Trite folks like ——— and ——— make me weary, and it's hard to keep it to myself. ——— sent in two reels of wildly exciting action with no plot reason for a lot of the action and about another reel of merely "cute" stuff that had nothing to do with the plot whatever. Then he tried to put in the punch with the tritest sort of trite tjtle. When I tried to explain a couple of things he got patronizing. I know he thinks I'm a lowbrow, but I'll have to let him think so because no one can explain the little things about this game which makes real art of it. You have to get completely absorbed in it. Then, if you have the goods, the buyers will come to you.

Lots of the people—including many of the big ones—have had success come so easily that they do not realize that writing a play is an art. They slap down a half baked idea, bolster up the weak points with fights and tension situations not germane to the story proper, drag in the most unheard of propositions with no excuse and then sell it for two reels. They are still selling because nothing better is to be had, just as in the early days of the one reel anything that looked to be more than half an idea would sell, but boom times are not going to last forever and the man or woman who wants to stick around next year and the year after must begin pretty soon to deliver the goods or find the field barred to them. One thousand feet of action does not make two thousand feet of film, nor does eighteen hundred feet. There must be the full two thousand feet of story in action and every foot of the action must tell part of the story. That's what a two reel story really is. There are very few of them being written yet.

Synopses.

Two correspondents want to argue that it is not possible to get the synopsis of a two reel story into 500 words. It most assuredly can be done. This morning we put the synopsis of a 60,000 word novel into 1,500 words and then again cut it down to 500. It can be done and done intelligently— but not if you say you cannot.

Is There?

A correspondent wants to know if there is a photoplay circle in Boston, and we can only echo the query. Since Miss Drew went out to Chicago we have had no reports from the Boston circle. Unless there is still such a circle there is a franchise open.

There's a Reason.

Miss Maibelle Heikes Justice has been up in Minnesota getting atmosphere for stories and having a good time camping in the bargain. Up there she dramatized her Thanksgiving story, The Pay-as-you-enter Man, and sent it as a two-reeler to the Essanay, which promptly took it: one of the departures from Mr. Spoor's rule not to play topicals. It was put in work before the check arrived.

"Of course, being an inside writer," she can do these things, but the only reason that Miss Justice is an inside writer is that she makes good and has repeated her making good until the Essanay and certain other studios have come to have confidence in her work. That's the reason any insider is an insider instead of being still on the outside.

Capacity.

In the October number of the Photoplay Author (and the P. A. is out on the 15th of the month of issue for the first time in its history), Marc Edmund Jones tells how he wrote seven two-reel stories in seven days. A personal letter of recent date explains that he has been writing little lately. One fact leads to the other. It is not possible to do more that a certain percentage of work, and Jones, like the rest of us, found that after this sprint he had to rest up. If your average capacity is three plots a week and you write six in one week, you'll find that you cannot write six the next week and the next. It is possible, in time, to raise your capacity to an average of four instead of three, but if you sprint and double your output you might as well plan to rest up as to have that rest forced upon you.

In a well written article Mr. Jones explains how he came by his plots; how this was pieces of three or four reels he had seen and how that idea came from another play, but he does not make it quite clear that he took only inspiration and not the idea itself, which fact should be remembered by those who read his article, for Jones is not a plagiarist, though his article slightly suggests that.

Mailing Day.

A writer who asks that his name be not used tells of his selling scheme, the essential of which is that he mails out stuff only once a week. The new story and the returns all go into a drawer and on one set day each week these are read over. If in the light of cold reason and reading the return does not seem to need revision, the material at hand is sent out to the companies most likely to take it, and by sending out only once a week and taking due deliberation, the scheme works better than where the rejection is sent right out again under a hit or miss system. You may, for example, have three scripts which suggest themselves as being likely to suit one company, but only one of these will suit a second company. If you had sent that script to the first company the moment it came in, you might have nothing to send the second, but under the mailing day scheme you send two to the first and one to the second and so have both companies keeping you in mind. It is an excellent scheme where many scripts are to be handled. Try it if you send out more than three or four a week, including the returns.

Overbought.

From a photoplaywright who has not yet reached the stage where he can refrain from using both colors on his bi-chrome ribbon, comes the suggestion that a certain company foolishly replies to persons making submission that they have enough scripts to last them for several months, and so are not buying. He adds that his script does not even seem to have been read. He opines that in refusing to read, the company may possibly be overlooking better material than it has on hand.

This, very probably, is true, but if the company has a stock of good stuff on hand, it would be foolish to buy more, and since it is not buying, there is no reason why it should be read. As Arthur Hotaling puts it, all of the authors are not going to die tomorrow and so it will be possible to get more good scripts when more are required and in the meantime the company has advertised the fact that it is not buying, and that is sufficient. Pop Hoadley at the last Inquest stated that hundreds of useless scripts were in stock at the Universal, a legacy from previous editors, and the same holds good almost everywhere. If there are enough scripts on hand, the purchase of others merely adds to the deadwood that some day must be thrown out. Some magazine offices have been known to throw out from $10,000 to $30,000 worth of purchased scripts in single lots, and the wise editor does not purchase too far ahead. They may lose an occasional good script, but others will be written that are just as good. There is always tomorrow and each day carries its own good scripts.

Inquiries

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of addresses to which photoplays may be sent will be mailed on receipt of a STAMPED AND ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of a script.

J. T. C.—David Morris was the father in "Father's Chicken Dinner." The Biograph Identifier is in doubt as to the other character yet, but will tell later. Palmer Bowman, Miss Harriet Notter and Miss Margaret Prussing were the players in "The Way of Life." Carl Stockdale was the messenger in "Days of the Pony Express." The companies will stop making westerns when there is no longer a market for them.

F. D.—The best place to sell a half-reel comedy is to a company making the sort of half-reels you have written. Look over the stories of the films and you'll see the styles. Most companies want the "slap dash" at present.

SPARKS—Komic is a brand of the Mutual in which the old Lubin comedy trio, Stull, Reehm and Burns, are appearing. At present they are working at the Reliance studio in Yonkers.

A. T. M.—If you cannot induce Mr. Melville to reply to your letter, notify him, by registered mail, that you withdraw the script and will hold him responsible for any use he may make of it. Then copy the carbon and send elsewhere.

G. H. O'N.—Neither the Answers Man's list, nor the very complete educational catalogue of Dr. Stockton lists the subject you ask for. Write to Kinemacolor. They may be the makers.

J. A. P.—You do not have to wait two years to write. Always glad to get letters. The Pittsburgh circle seems to have gone into a decline. Hire a typewriter for three months and learn to use it. It is easier than it looks and your copyist fees will not eat up all your profits. It will also help you study your faults, which appear more clearly in the typed script.

NICOLAUS—We do not think that there is any market for the style of script you want to write. Historical subjects are prepared in the studio and are rarely, if ever, accepted from outsiders.

L. H.—That Broncho cast has not come in from the Identifier and the Powers cast has not been given. Sorry. Broncho answer later. We believe that Mr. Wilbur was in the Adirondacks when he was reported as about to join another company.

F. H. R.—To your first inquiry the reply is no. We will advertise your desire. Kinemacolor uses a specially sensitized film for negative. It is a trade secret. The usual stock can be used for positive. Hand coloring on pictures is done with very minute brushes under a powerful magnifying glass. It is not an impossibility, as you suggest. Most of the old Pathe and Gaumont colored pictures were colored by stencils, a stencil of the entire length being made for each color applied, then the stencil and the film is run through a machine which brushes the color on with a camel's hair wheel. Sorry we have not the cast you ask for.

ELIZABETH—If you do not want to flash a letter received and one written in the same scene, write in an earlier scene in which the first letter is written and shown. We lack that Victor cast, but will try and get it. We hardly think that a play with two characters would hold the interest, but it has been done and so can be done again. As a general thing the film buyers object to small casts, feeling that they are not getting their money's worth. If there are other characters, two old ladies might hold the principal roles and interest. The Last Old Lady was played in an old ladies' home and there were no young women at all. Better not vision back. Start with the action you will need later and then use a time leader You cannot break between the scene and the vision with a leader.

M. S. S.—We have no Kinemacolor casts. Miss Snow is in some Thanhousers, but your theater does not get these.

C. J. L.—Eastern Universal is practically not buying. The Western studios take a little. See note above about addresses. Send only two part dramas to the licensed companies, though Vitagraph announces it can use some three part stories. The Famous Players do not seem to be in the market. The same applies to Warner's Features. We think that Mr. Lessey has left the Edison.

M. S. R.—Mr Lang's story on the multiple reel ran in Aug. 24 and 31 and Sept. 6. Mr. Plimpton wrote for the Aug. 31 issue The McCloskey story ran Sept. 27 and Oct 4 and 11

RICHARD ROE—Miss Dollie Larkin was the sweetheart in Apache Kid. Edwin Carewe was the minister, and Earle Metcalf Jack Ames in "The Call of the Heart" Whaddye mean, book on kinematography? Nothing of recent issue treating of the subject generally, but we understand that Lippincotts will presently bring out a new and more intelligent edition of the Talbot book. Have you see the Kinematograph Hand Book? It is not new, but it is authoritative. Send an envelope for the address if you want it.

RUBEENA—Again no letter! Why?

Question No. 5.

BEST answer will be published and names of others sending in replies of excellence will be published in the "Roll of Honor."

> Suppose you had charge of a projection plant in which current was furnished for the arcs through a motor-generator set, the generator of which was a 3½ k. w., 110 volt shunt-wound. Suppose you were using 30 amperes and the manager came up and demanded that you deliver a more brilliant projection. Suppose that, in an endeavor to satisfy the manager's demand, you cut out resistance enough to boost the amperage to 35, whereupon the arc suddenly went entirely out. Now, suppose you, after a few seconds, brought the carbons together again the arc struck only to go out immediately, what would you assume the reason to be, and how would you prove it?

This is something that it is essential for every operator to know. The answer is simple. Dig around and find out what it is. You may be called upon to handle just that kind of an outfit at any time and run up against that identical proposition. Therefore, as I before remarked, get busy and get wise.

Some Very Interesting Data.

Another portion of friend Martin's article reads as follows:

> Within certain limits of projection, which may be described as the illumination necessary to project an image not exceeding one hundred square feet in area, direct current through a resistance is not highly preferable to alternating current supplied through an auto-transformer, the service voltage being equal in each case at 110 volts. Many forms of self-regulating motor generator sets, auto-transformers and rectifiers, all having regulation characteristics closely approaching that of a metallic resistance, are in use. Figure 7 shows the comparative efficiency of the arc operating in conjunction with these machines. All the readings were taken after setting the lamp for the most satisfactory operation. The majority of motion picture theaters use auto-transformers of high reactance which are manufactured and marketed under various trade names. For the reason that the use of alternating current gives a very low efficiency at the arc, requiring heavier current for a given illumination, and an accompanying increase in heat dissipated, and under average conditions will increase the inherent flicker of the projected image, it is highly desirable to standardize the apparatus so that direct current is supplied to the projection lamp. A careful analysis indicates that this apparatus should be a motor-generator set, the motor allowing of substitution for either alternating or direct current at different voltages, and the generator having a capacity of 3.5 kilowatts, 65 volts, direct current, compound wound and designed to deliver 175% full load for a five-minute period of each hour. One or more projection lamps, each connected through a small resistance to give the necessary ballast, could be supplied from this machine and could be operated simultaneously for short periods without affecting the other. The field rheostat and lamp ballast should be placed conveniently near the operator so that the intensity of light can be regulated for the varying-density of the films. This machine could be universally used with an improvement in economy and quality of projection. The relative efficiency of this machine is also illustrated in Figure 7.

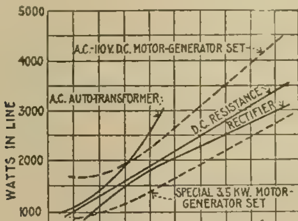

Fig 7.—Performance of projector arc on alternating to direct current converters.

I do not know whether to take issue with friend Martin in the matter of his first conclusion or not. It would altogether depend on what he means by "highly preferable." Direct current is preferable for projecting a picture of any area, not alone because it is usually cheaper, even when the surplus voltage is broken down (by resistance in the case of d. c. and transformed in the case of a. c.), but also by reason of the fact that the light quality is ordinarily more mellow, and better adapted to the artistic lighting of a projected picture. Mind you, I mean cheaper for the same c. p. illumination of the screen.

The chart submitted is, like the others shown in the series, very interesting. It will be observed that at 10,000 effective c. p. there is not quite 500 watts difference between d. c. through resistance and a. c. through a rectifier—presumably a mercury arc rectifier, the difference being in favor of the rectifier. An a. c. auto-transformer, according to this chart, only gives about 5,500 c. p. at 3,000 watts, whereas at 3,000 watts the rectifier gives more than 10,000 c. p. and d. c. through resistance given about 8,000, and a. c. to d. c. motor-generator sets give almost 7,000, all of which is intensely interesting, if it is fact. According to this chart the special 3½ k. w. motor-generator set of the kind above indicated is the most effective device we have, giving 11,000 c. p. at 3,000 watts. I would strongly advise operators and managers to study this table and to carefully examine into its correctness, so far as it is possible to do so. I am going to ask friend Martin to tell us in what way and by what tests these conclusions were arrived at, or, in other words, under what conditions this chart was made. Of course, as is shown in his text, the 3½ k. w. was a 65 volt generator, whereas the dynamo of the other motor generator set delivered 110 volt current, which was then again to be broken down to arc voltage by means of resistance.

This table and friend Martin's conclusions seem to support the opinion of the editor of this department, which have been published time and again, that the low voltage generator is best adapted to the purpose of supplying current to projection arcs.

Old Lamp.

Newport, Oregon, is a gas operator of six years' experience who has just recently tackled electric projection. He says:

> From pictures I have seen of the latest Power's lamp there seems to be a device for moving the top carbon back and forth, but none for the lower. I am using an old-style Power's lamp. In handling the light, I set the upper carbon in line with the lamp bars, as per your instruction, except that I angle it just the least bit forward, say one-eighth of an inch. I never move the upper carbon, but keep my crater in shape by working the lower carbon back and forth, as the occasion demands. I am very well satisfied with results for I am able to get a clear screen; but I object to the unhandy method. Am using 43 amperes of 110 volt a. c. through a Preddey economizer. This gives me a brilliant picture, even with dense films. Is my method of handling the light considered good practice? If so, is there no device for racking the lower carbon back and forth?

The moving of your carbons backward and forward by tilting it in a holder is not good practice, because either you must have a poor, or rather loose contact with the lower carbon arm, or else loosen and tighten every time, and anyhow it is difficult to always get the carbon exactly where you want it. Modern, up-to-date lamps, including the Power's six, have an adjustment by means of which the upper carbon may be moved backward and forward in relation to the lower. It would not make a particle of difference, in effect, whether this movement was applied to the upper or the lower carbon, except that it would be more difficult to apply it to the lower. The effect, however, would be the same. I would advise you, Newport, to get an up-to-date lamp. Doubtless your picture is brilliant as compared to gas, but unless it is quite small it is not really so if you only use 43 amperes a. c.

Exhibitors' Camera.

There has been considerable inquiry, mostly from exhibitors, for a practical, moderate priced exhibitors' camera, with which a record of local events could be made. Mr. J. H. Hallberg, whose address may be obtained from his advertisement on another page, has secured the selling agency of what seems to be a very excellent, compact, moderate priced camera. It measures 9½ by 9¼ by 4¾ inches; weighs 10 pounds, and the tripod weighs 14 pounds more, making a total of 24 pounds for the whole apparatus. It has the up and down movement, and the sidewise swing, holds 100 feet of negative, and seems to be very well made indeed. The camera itself, I understand, costs $175 complete, and for $100 additional the purchaser will be provided with a complete outfit, consisting of a printing machine with motor, a half dozen film racks, a complete set of developing tanks, ruby light, chemicals, and complete specifications for the erection of a dark room about 10 by 12 feet.

This information is supplied, not at Mr. Hallberg's request, but in answer to the many letters which from time to time have been received asking for just such an outfit. The Whyte Whitman Company has been advertising a similar outfit for some time.

Half-Size Lenses.

Mr. William Hofman, Kewanee, Ill., writes interestingly as follows:

> Will you express your opinion again as regards half-size lens for projecting moving pictures? I have had such a lens in use for about three months. The machine is somewhat worn, as it has been run for two years without installation of any new parts, therefore I had to stop the lens down to 1½ inches diameter. It still, however, is an improvement over the quarter size, but it does not compare in brilliance with the open lens. The machine is a Power's Six. As it will soon be sent to the factory for overhauling, I will not make any experiments until its return, but it seems to me that, theoretically at least, the size (diameter) of the shutter should be about twice what it now is for the half-size lens. In other words, it should be 16 inches, with the blades retaining the same proportion as in the present shutter. Since the peripheral speed of the larger shutter would be greater than that of the smaller, it would close the lens opening faster were the two lens sizes the same. But as the half-size lens is nearly double the quarter size in diameter, the faster speed of the shutter for the half-size would about balance with the slower speed with which the smaller size is closed. In the same way the wider shutter blades, at a higher speed, would balance with the regular ones at the same revolutions per minute. The proportions being kept right, the half-size lens would give a much better picture, without any more travel ghost than the quarter size. Now, what I want to ask is, would a twelve-inch shutter help any? It would be the largest I could put into my operating room without cutting into the wall, and it would be quite difficult moving the machine over. Also I would like to know if chain drive would be practical from the present shaft to the new one.
> As regards the questions you started, and have not yet decided whether to continue, I would like to say that no really competent operator could have objection to them, as a person can only understand just a little ahead of what he is in general educated up to, and a beginner would not get very much out of simply reading the questions and answers, unless he did considerable extra thinking in connection therewith. And those who would do that would get the information somewhere anyhow, so why not help along those who are capable of learning and understanding? I do not think the graduated ushers will be brought into the class of good operators by reading the questions and answers, and if they are, it would be because they would be capable of being good operators and, in a free country, are entitled to have as much help as the next one. I vote to continue the questions.

Well, brother Hofman, your reasoning sounds plausible, but I think there is one thing you have overlooked, viz: that if you were to extend the diameter of the shutter to sixteen inches, you would have to alter its present wing-form. If you placed your lens near the outer diameter of a sixteen-inch shutter, the same being modeled on the form of the present shutter, you would find, I think, that the wing width would have a totally different relation to the intermittent movement than it had with a smaller shutter. On the other hand, if the present blade was so made that its blade edges formed a line from the center of the hub to and on past the present blade edge at the point of diameter of the present blade opposite the center of the lens, then, no matter whether the lens set six inches or sixteen inches from the shutter center, the shutter blade would pass the lens in exactly the same time, and the effect would remain the same. Now while I do not state this as an absolutely determined fact, I do not believe you could get the effect you seek in the way you propose. That is the way it looks to me and I believe you will find I am right too. As to the half-size lenses, I cannot see that there is any possibility of obtaining largely added brilliancy through its use, for several reasons. My personal view of the matter is that there is a decided advantage in using the half size and stopping down its diameter, this by reason of the fact that you in that way secure a sharper definition than is possible with the quarter size lens, because you cut out the edge of the lens, which is its weakest part. I would like to see this matter discussed by operators. I am simply stating my own impressions. However, a great deal depends on the condenser combination. The condensers at present in use with the moving picture machine are very far from perfect, and there is room for immense improvement. It yet remains to evolve some practical scheme for eliminating condenser breakage, so that really high class high price lenses can be used, and it is up to somebody to figure out precisely the right condenser combination to use with any objective lens. When all this is done, and it will be done, the guesswork, which we are all obliged to indulge in at present, will largely be a thing of the past, and I can then tell you what to do under any given circumstance. This objective lens diameter is worthy of discussion and experiment, and I shall be glad to hear from any of our readers who feel competent to offer advice, or who have any enlightening and interesting experiences to relate along these lines.

As to the questions, I have started them again, and they will be continued this time to the end. I have made up my mind that if the matter is properly handled there is absolutely no valid objection to it. By the way, I almost forgot: no, a chain drive would not work well on such high speed, though you could use chain drive for experimental work successfully.

Can't Be Given.

Mr. George Harris, Henderson, Kentucky, is about to build a moving picture theater in Lebanon, Kentucky. He will have 60 cycles 110 volt current and intends to put in a G. E. motor generator set, but has been told that the Wagner Rotary Converter is superior. He asks my opinion on this matter.

In the first place I could not express an opinion of this kind through the Department, and in the second place, while quite a number of theater managers have written me concerning their experience with the Wagner Rotary Converter, the Wagner Company itself has taken no steps to convince this Department of the efficiency of its device. I may say, however, that both the G. E. set and the Wagner Rotary appear to be good machines. I would like to see the result of actual tests, setting forth the efficiency of both these devices; these tests to be made under actual working conditions.

Picture Jumps.

Brooklyn, New York, wants to know the requirements of Local No. 306, and its address. He then continues:

> I have a motor driven Power's Six A, and Standard American No. 4. On the Power's Six the picture jumps, three or four times to each turn of the crank continuously. On some reels the picture jumps as usual, but at a certain joint the jump is very much worse for a minute or so; also the film makes a noise as it passes under the tension springs, four times at the turn of the crank. Decreasing the tension decreases the noise, but increases the jumping of the picture. Will you kindly tell me: (A) What are the symptoms when the intermittent shaft is bent? (B) When one bushing is worn more than the other, or the two are worn out, or when the sprocket teeth are worn sufficiently to need changing? (C) When the intermittent sprocket shaft is out of alignment with the cam shaft? (D) When the cam or cross is worn? Please tell me also which is the best and most exact way of testing the alignment of intermittent sprocket shaft with cam shaft in the Sandard machine.

The requirements of Local 306 are that you shall be a competent operator. Its address is 259 West 42d Street, Manhattan. As to your Power's Six trouble it might be due to dirt on the face of the intermittent sprocket. It might be that the sprocket itself is not true, or that the shaft is bent; though the latter is not likely, as Power's Six A intermittent sprocket shaft is too heavy to bend very easily. Any one of these things might, or would, cause the jumping of the picture four times to every turn of the crank, or in other words, at every revolution of the intermittent sprocket. I would suggest that you take the head over to Power's factory. Any necessary repairs will cost you nothing if the mechanism is less than one year old.

And now as to your questions: with regard to the noise the film makes, you will have to describe the effect more clearly. The trouble is not, I believe, in the tension shoe, but either in the intermittent sprocket or apron. (A) Jumping of the picture four times to each turn of the crank. (B) Excessive wear on the intermittent bearings might cause unsteady picture. You can detect this wear by shaking the shaft up and down. If there is much movement in either one or all of the bearings, the worn one should be removed. As to wear in intermittent sprocket teeth, there is no set rule. Use common sense and judgment, remembering that worn intermittent sprocket teeth are not only very hard on a film, but are likely to cause unsteadiness in the picture. The average operator runs his intermittent sprocket altogether too long. (C) There is no special symptom which can be seen, but if the shaft is out of alignment then the teeth on one side of the intermittent sprocket will be doing the greater amount of work and the wear on the teeth will be uneven. See also Instruction 38, page 281 of Handbook. (D) Excessive noise is the best indication. If the cross and the cam are in good condition and are properly adjusted they should run with a slight clicking sound when the machine is operated without a film. As to aligning the cam and sprocket shaft in a Standard; to give the answer properly would require several cuts and some space. You will find complete Standard machine instructions given in the issue of February the third, 1912, which you may perhaps still obtain for ten cents from this office. The Standard people, I think, will also furnish printed instructions. I would also refer you to instruction 4, page 305 of the Handbook, a copy of which you should by all means have. It is a book of altogether 450 pages, more than 400 of which are devoted entirely to instructions to the operator and manager, the same being supplemented by 176 illustrations every one of which is original and every one of which is designed to illustrate some instruction. Many of these instructions and illustrations, notably the machine instructions, cost a great deal of money to prepare. For instance, the machine instruction cuts on each one of the leading machines, the Edison, Power's, Simplex, Motiograph, and Standard cost almost $100.00, yet you get all this, and hundreds of other pages of genuine instruction, for $2.50. In other words for that sum you get what it cost me many months of hard labor and many hundreds of dollars to prepare—a pretty reasonably good investment, is it not? I dwell upon it at this length in your case because you are in Greater New York and probably near this office frequently. You would therefore have to take but a few steps to examine a back file for the information you want and at the same time examine the Handbook to verify my statement.

Insufficient Data.

Marianna, Arkansas, propounds the following:

> Have recently installed a Power's Six machine, on a 74 foot throw. The current is 133 cycle, 110 volt a. c. through a Fort Wayne Compensarc. There is a bad flicker which I have been unable to eliminate. Have tried a three-wing shutter, also a two-wing Edison shutter, but without result. The light is good, the picture is steady and everything is satisfactory except for the flicker.

Your data is insufficient. It is quite possible that you are using heavy amperage on a small picture, projecting the same upon some type of semi-reflecting screen. It is also possible that you are running your machine at very low speed, or it might be a combination of both. The shutters you have used are as well proportioned as any. However, try the following: make an exact pattern of your present shutter out of some stiff pasteboard, or of tin. You need not have any outside rim. Just cut the wings out without any connecting rim at the outer edge. Now trim off from the edge of the main blade, a little at a time, until you get it just as narrow as is possible without developing travel-ghost when the framing carriage is clear up or clear down. If your lens is of long focal length, or, in other words, if you are projecting a small picture you may be able to trim of considerable of the main blade. If you find you are able to cut off any great amount without developing travel ghost, you can then add a little bit to the width of each one of the flicker blades, the idea being to bring the three blades as near as possible to an equal width, which is the ideal condition so far as flicker is concerned. You must remember, however, if you have a very brilliant picture you cannot entirely eliminate flicker in light films unless your machine is speeded up to very nearly 60 a minute. After you get your pasteboard or tin shutter just right you can, using it as a pattern, fix your regular shutter to match.

A Clever and Positive Take-Up.

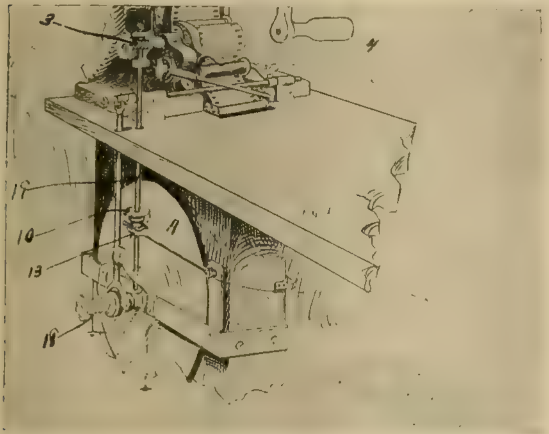
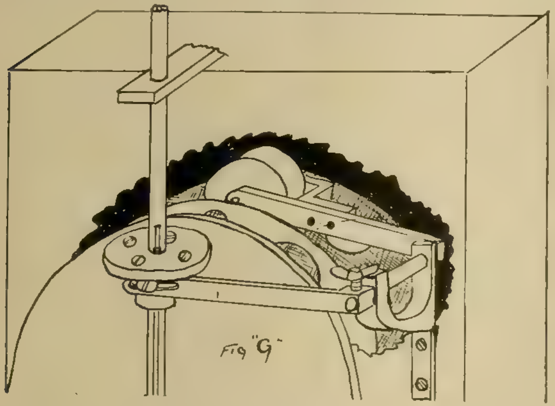
Mr. J. Roy Hunt, Birmingham, Alabama, submits description and sketch of what seems to me to be a very practical take-up device which will deliver the goods, in that it will not only provide a positive take-up, but will also give a uniform pull on the film throughout the entire process of re-winding.



Briefly the action of the device seems to be as follows: Attached to the take-up spindle is a large, flat iron disc, revolved by means of friction wheel 10, which latter is carried on shaft 19, upon which it is free to slide up and down. The connection between friction wheel 10, and shaft 19 is provided through a long key-way and key, so that the wheel can slide freely on the shaft. Shaft 19 is revolved by gear 3. Attached to friction wheel 10 is an arm having a fork which engages with the slot in the hub of friction wheel 10. The other end of this arm attaches to a spindle which passes inside of the magazine and is attached to the second arm carrying a roller which rests on the film roll as shown in Figure G.



Now these two arms being rigidly attached to the same shaft it naturally follows that as the film roll increases in size the inside arm is raised, and this, of course, also raises the outer arm, which carries with it friction wheel 10. Inasmuch as friction wheel 10 runs at a steady speed very naturally the higher it is raised the slower the large friction disc will run, and thus the speed of the reel is reduced exactly in proportion as the film is rewound. This action, however, is supplemented by the action of roller 4 which rests on the film between the lower machine sprocket and the magazine fire-trap. By following back the attachments of this roller it will be seen that if the film-pull gets too strong, roller 4 will be raised, against the pressure of spring 18 on the outer end of the lower magazine spindle, and this, through suitable mechanism, reduces the friction between the large friction disc A and a friction wheel 10, thus automatically cutting down the pull on the film.

This device appears to be, as far as can be determined from drawings, practical, and, moreover, it is not sufficiently complicated to be objectionable from a mechanical point of view. Whether friend Hunt intends to manufacture the device himself or sell it to some machine manufacturer he does not state.

Take Up the Card.

Under the heading, "Never Again," page 46, October 4th issue, Rochester, Indiana, says he has a card in Local 194 in Indianapolis, Ind. Local Union 194, Indianapolis, Ind., now writes, saying Mr. Faulkner was, for good and sufficient reasons, expelled from the organization and is no longer a member of Local 194. The local expresses regret at being obliged to write upon such an unpleasant topic, but says that facts are facts.

Yes, this sort of thing is to be regretted, but if this man is claiming membership which is not rightly his, then the fact should be known and the card should be taken up by the first man to whom it is presented.

From New Orleans.

New Orleans, Louisiana, writes:

> I have had nine years' experience, working pretty much all over the country during that time. At present am running two Edison projectors, getting a very good picture at 60 feet. We do not get much pay here, and work seven days a week, from 10 a. m. to 11 p. m. Those are the hours of nearly every house, though I understand they are now considering opening at 9 A. M. There is one theater which opens at 7 A. M. and closes at midnight. I am looking for them to establish bunks in the operating room and have meals served there, because probably we will soon begin to run all night and all day, in which case possibly the operator will be allowed a helper. He can then lie down in the bunk and sleep, one eye at the time, keeping one open of course, and upon the aforesaid helper, to prevent accident. He might sleep the left eye from, say, midnight to 2 o'clock, and then sleep the right eye from 2 till 5, though, of course, he may have to get up at 4, since all those hours wasted in rest would probably worry the average New Orleans manager. To show you how much some of the managers here know, my boss often come up and tells me to frame my picture on the side. I grab on to the table legs and give it a yank (without moving anything, of course) and he says: "there, it's all right now." This happens when sprocket holes show on the side, as they will sometimes. Again, he will tell me to focus my picture, and I will lay my hand on the lens without moving it, and he will remark: "There, that is much better now," which shows that, though lacking in knowledge, he is strong on imagination. I have a patent which I think will prove to be a good thing. You will hear from me regarding it before very long.

I imagine, New Orleans, that your city will compare very closely with other moderately large municipalities in which the bad is very much mixed with the good. Possibly, however, New Orleans has more than her fair share of poor managers. I do not know. Reports indicate that there are some good houses in that city, and a few places, at least, where projection is very good, though conditions seem to be very far from satisfactory when viewed as a whole. We shall be glad to have a description of your patent whenever it is ready. There is no objection to opening at 9 a. m. and closing at 11 p. m. as that only gives each operator a seven-hour trick. Of course no manager, unless he be insane, would expect one operator to work those hours, or even from 11 to 11.

Measuring Lenses.

Athens, Georgia, contributes the following:

> Your questions, which started in October 4th issue, are the stuff. I believe they will be of large benefit to operators. I have noticed several methods of figuring lenses set forth, but we boys of Local 548, have an easier way than any we have seen. We pass it along, hoping some one else may profit. In measuring lenses there is always one unknown quantity to figure. Let X equal e. f. of required lens, 15-16 equal the aperture opening and 60 equal the throw. Now suppose a 12-foot picture be required. We then have the equation, as 15-16 is to X so is 12 to 60, which problem would be written thus:
> $\frac{15}{16}$ : X :: 12 : 60, or 12 X = $\frac{900}{16}$ or X = $\frac{75}{16}$ = 4.69 in., which is the e. f. of required lens.
> In an equation of this kind the product of the extremes must equal the product of the means. Therefore, we have 12 X = (15-16 X 60). To multiply 15-16 by 60, we multiply 15 by 60 and divide by 16, which gives 56.25, therefore, 12 X = 56.25, or X = 56.25 ÷ 12 equals practically 4.69, which is the equivalent focus of lens required to protect a 12-foot picture on a 60-foot throw.

Well, Athens, I cannot see it. If you look in the Handbook, page 356, you will there find directions given for measuring lenses, in which you are told to multiply the width of the aperture, in fractions of an inch, by the throw, in feet, and divide that sum by the width of the picture, in fact, the result being the e. f. of the required lens. I cannot see where your scheme is any plainer or any shorter. It is in fact the same identical thing, except you have stated it as an equation, which is perfectly correct, but does not gain you anything. Moreover, it does not do to assume that the aperture is 15-16 of an inch. You must measure it very carefully with an inside calliper, since aperture widths vary and a small variations there may make a whole lot of difference in the result on the screen.

New Pastil.

As before noted, Mr. Charles Russell, British Columbia, Canada, has invented a new pastil. Mr. Russell was the first man who tested Mr. Lindall's French pastil and made a very favorable report. He now says:

> I have been using one pastil in my lamp for fourteen days. It has burned to a saucer shape and certainly gives a powerful light. It is hard as steel, and there is no danger of its breaking. The process of making is long, but it pays, as the finished article will withstand the pressure of a shot gun. I think they can be used with high pressure tanks all right. Our plant here is a. c. and is stopped every night, therefore, I was obliged to resort to the model B, which I use in conjunction with the new Power's Six A. I have run Zigomar and all the heavy stuff without any trouble. Mr. Lindall's pastil is all right, but it is expensive and fragile. I can make the pastil at 50 cents, and test every one before shipping. I have just installed a new Power's Six A and a Sherlock-Manning piano player, and am giving the best possible projection. My prices are 15 and 25 cents. This is a good show town.

What you say sounds mighty good, but I am compelled, before giving your article the endorsement of this department, to ask you to send two or three of them to me for testing. I am obliged to take that position with every one. If I let down the bars on one proposition, I would soon be flooded with demands for my endorsement of articles the actual merit of which I do not know. It is a case of "show me," and I hope Friend Russell will be able to do so; also I believe he will.

List of Books Wanted.

Mr. C. E. Linstruth, Carthage, New York, writes:

> Just a few words with regard to the new questions. My personal opinion is they are the best card you have as yet played. Can I answer them? No, I don't know how. Our town has a small library, but I fail to find what I need there, and even if I could the books could only be borrowed. I want to buy the different books which will be of value to the operator, and would suggest that you publish the names of the different standard works which treat on motor generator construction, action, etc., and state where they can be had. I have your two Handbooks, but, valuable as they are, they won't fill a shelf, and I desire to go the limit in technical perfection. I have been trying to project a good picture for eight years, and, strange as it may seem, what looked like a good picture a year ago, doesn't seem good enough now, and so it goes; hence, the desire to go deeper into technical knowledge. For instance, here is a question I would like help on, viz: how to wind the motor for different currents. In other words, suppose I have but one motor which is wound for 110 volt 60 cycle current, and I wish to use it on 220 volt 60 cycle. Some of the boys claim they have to do it on the road. How is it done? Perhaps you have noted the Kinemacolor Company have selected a site for their eastern plant. It is only sixteen miles from here, and I like such neighbors.

The preparation of a list of books is a big job, and one concerning which I do not like to accept responsibility. The trouble with text books is that, as a general proposition, you find a little that you want in one and a little in another and so on, but there is no one book containing any large amount of matter useful to the operator. I would like to hear from operators who have a library, as to which particular books they have found to be of greatest value. Please give name of the book, its author, its publisher, and the price of the book. I wish we had more men like Friend Linstruth. He is on the right path when the picture which looked good to him a year ago doesn't look good now. Let us hope that a year hence his present picture will be equally unsatisfactory. That is the kind of man who will make a really high class operator, who some day will command a good salary, and not have to look for a job either. As to the motor proposition, I have asked Mr. J. H. Hallberg to, and he has consented to prepare instructions covering the data you request. It is possible to use a 110 volt motor on 220 by putting resistance in series with it. There are also motors having two commutators which can be used for either 220 or 110 volts, according to how they are connected to the line. It is also possible to have two armatures for one motor, one wound for 110, and one for 220. I feel, however, that Mr. Hallberg is more capable of dealing with this particular proposition than am I, and I am sure the matter he will prepare will be of much value.

Photometry.

Mr. Jos. H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas, gives a brief, but correct answer to question No. 1, and then says.

> Now, in answer to the comment on "A Suggestion," page 44, October 4th issue, you did not quite get my idea. It was not so much the matter of candle power, as of such problems as the following: how many 50 c. p. globes could you supply current to with a No. 16 B. & S. wire? No. 16 wire has a diameter of 50.820 mills, which multiplied by itself, gives 2,582.90 as the circular mill area. The carrying capacity is 6 amperes, which at 110 volts equals 660 watts carrying capacity. Now a 16 c. p. carbon lamp uses 55 watts, therefore, $55 \div 16 = 3.4375$, the number of watts per c. p. which we may take roundly at 3.5 watts per c. p. for the ordinary carbon lamp. It, therefore, follows that the 50 candle globes would consume $50 \times 3.5 = 175$ watts. One of the questions Mr. Havill, the Chicago examiner, used to ask was: "How many 16 candle power globes would a No. 14 B. & S. wire supply current to?" How many operators know the right reply? Some imagine this is out of their line, but I hold every operator should be posted on such things.

Yes, Friend Smith, that is all correct enough, but it has nothing to do with photometry, which is the measurement of light. Moreover, any operator who will study wiring, pages 22 to 37 of the Handbook, will, I think, be able to arrive at a complete understanding of the things you have named. I agree with you that the operator ought to understand all these matters, and in the smaller towns it is frequently quite essential that he understand them, since he may often be compelled to do his own wiring, if it is done at all. I do not believe in operators doing wiring, except where it is, by reason of local conditions, necessary, but I do believe he should possess sufficient knowledge to check up the work of the wire-man, to see if it has been properly done.

Motor Speed Control.

Mr. George A. Bleich, managing owner Empress Theater, Owensboro, Kentucky, puts up the following kick:

> Are the makers of projectors so overwhelmed with business that they can afford to assume the indifferent attitude toward their customers' wants and needs which the enclosed correspondence indicates. My order for a ———— projector was placed through a jobber with the understanding that its makers had adopted a speed control for the motor drive that could be depended upon to give satisfaction. This understanding was arrived at from the reading of a letter on the subject from the makers to the jobber. What was furnished us was no more or less than a variable speed motor, and if any operator can get satisfactory results from one I would like to know the formula. But the real point is, however, the very cavalier treatment of the letter I wrote the manufacturers concerning the matter. Will I buy another ————? Not if I know it!

I give space to brother Bleich's kick for the benefit of all machine manufacturers. In the long run, I am firmly convinced that it pays any manufacturer to tell the consumer exactly what he has instead of trying to hide facts in ambiguous statements. It does not do to tell the consumer that you have an article which can "be depended upon to give satisfaction." That is not sufficient. Tell the man exactly what you really have got, and if you have not got the right thing dig around and get it.

I do not wish to be misunderstood in this matter. It is possible to get good results from a variable speed d.c. motor. I have done it myself. With alternating motors, however, there is invariably trouble, and the mechanical drive is, in my judgment, much better. Now there is no reason in the world why all machine manufacturers could not supply a good mechanical speed control. There are a great many ways of making such a device, and no one is barred. As to the treatment of your communication, I do not think the company in question intended to chop you off short. Probably the letter was really dictated by some supernumerary, the top of whose head was principally filled with vacuum. You have not stated what kind of current you use, but if it is a.c. I would arrange a mechanical drive along the lines of one of those shown on pages 370 and 371 of the Handbook. I believe the one shown in Figure 153 would, if carefully made, deliver very good results, and its making would not be at all expensive. Mr. W. G. Preddy, care M. P. M. O. Union, 68 Haight Street, San Francisco, Cal., can supply you with a mechanical control; see p. 1281, September 20 issue.

New Type of Mirroroide.

Mr. J. H. Genter, of the J. H. Genter Company, Newburgh, N. Y., manufacturers of mirroroide screens, writes:

> I enclose herewith small samples of our latest goods in the screen line. You will notice by laying these alongside one another their different shades and tints. After careful experimenting we have perfected this line of goods so as to apply to the A or B grade the tints which may be desired by the exhibitors. You will notice one is a pale flesh color; one a pale gold, and the other pure white. We have some testimonials which draw invidious comparisons between the mirroroide and other screens. Of course, we will not use this kind of testimonial as we do not believe in knocking our competitors. We think the field is large enough for all. We will send you large samples of these various shades for testing if you desire, and will also send you pictures of our latest method of hanging screens. This method will eliminate any defect, and we will absolutely guarantee the invisibility of seams where the new method of hanging is used.

Viewed apart one does not see any particular difference in the surface of the three samples submitted, but the instant they are placed side by side, there is a very great difference, and I am inclined to believe that the amber tint might have a very considerable effect in softening the light tone; hence, might be of very real value, especially when used in conjunction with alternating current. The flesh color in a very pale pinkish cast. I would be very greatly interested in seeing a test of these three screens made side by side at the same time, with three films of the same subject. That is, I presume, impossible. Nevertheless, say what you will, that is the only method of arriving at a definite, certain conclusion as to the exact value of tinted surfaces. I am of the opinion that the tinting, if not carried too far, as it is not in these samples, is of distinct value in softening the harshness of the light.

Yes, Friend Genter, I want the pictures of your new method of hanging screens. One of the legitimate and valuable functions of this department is to describe things of this kind. Your refusal to advertise by the knock method is highly commendable—also it is the right policy. As to the large samples, why I doubtless will soon see the various surfaces in use in theaters, so I guess sending them is hardly necessary.

Lending the Handbook.

Des Moines, Iowa, encloses $2.50 for the Handbook and says:

> I have been using one belonging to a friend long enough to realize how essential this book is to the moving picture theater operator. If you would advise every purchaser to loan his copy to some friend for a few days you certainly would, in most cases, get an order from the man to whom it was loaned.

In the first place I do not think the majority of purchasers would be willing to loan the book, mainly for the reason that loaned books have a habit of failing to return. The sale of the book is steady and very satisfactory. It has already run up into the thousands and it is going forward right along. Out of all the books sold there is not a single purchaser, up to date, who has expressed any dissatisfaction whatever; whereas, I could not begin to tell you how many letters of enthusiastic endorsement have been received. I think the book may fairly be said to have thoroughly proven its worth.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

"A FALLEN HERO" (Biograph), October 23.—A farce in which comic facial expression and queer make-up effects for grotesque characters furnish most of the fun. Biograph farce players are amusing, but their material here is weak. There was not a great deal of laughter.

"THE WINNING PUNCH" (Biograph), October 23.—On the same reel with the foregoing farce is this in which a church fair is turned into a success by the deacon's son who puts plenty of "stick" in the red lemonade and then gives it away. This makes the "tight-wads" generous and then it sets the congregation dancing. The old farmer, winking over his glass of punch, was the only laugh during this picture in both of two houses on Broadway.

"THE KID SHERIFF" (Essanay), October 23.—A good story well "put over" makes this picture by the regular Western company a pleasing release. There is humor in it, and a few laughs in such pictures make them go well everywhere. The ending scenes in this picture, those in which the bad man who had just caught the sheriff and the express agent holding up the stage and had taken his shield together with the "swag" is brought into the sheriff's office under arrest by the "kid" and shows him up with proofs, reflects on the writer of the script and the producer. It is a very likeable release, well played and clearly produced in every way.

"OLD AND NEW TAHITI" (Melies), October 23.—This interesting offering opens with a picture of modern Tahitians and with one old man telling a story of long ago when the chief, now a grown man and seated in modern clothes near by, was a baby. The story of the struggle between two clans for possession of this royal infant is then pictured and makes a clear, interesting narrative. The scenes have been well photographed and give such glimpses of life on the island as other Melies pictures have furnished. Mildred Bracken plays the island queen, and two American players take roles as beach-combing sailors who are with the attacking party. When these whites go on a spree their side is defeated.

"OPENING OF THE SHICHIJIO BRIDGE, JAPAN" (Melies), October 23.—On the same reel is this, furnishing a delightful glimpse of Japanese human nature. A good release.

"LIFE FOR LIFE" (Selig), October 23.—The title does not describe the story of this picture. In the story, there is only one pulmotor in town. A boy is drowned and a call is sent for it. At about the same time the mayor's son is also drowned and he telephones to the fire department to bring it to his house. The chief refuses and saves the life of the first sufferer, while the son of the mayor is resuscitated by other methods. It has been developed to be effective and makes a very commendable pleasing offering. It should go strongly, for it has a smack of the kind of democracy that appeals.

"THE DOCTOR'S SECRET" (Vitagraph), October 23.—The plot was carefully written by W. A. Tremayne, and Van Dyke Brooke has skillfully and artistically produced it into a fine picture. But it will be liked on account of its characters rather than its story, which is not of real life and demands a mental reservation on the spectator's part. The acting is of high order and the scenes and the lighting very effective.

"SLEUTHS UNAWARES" (Vitagraph), October 22.—The two Vitagraph tramps, Sandy and Shorty (Robert Thornby and George Stanley), who have appeared in pictures by the Western company, have the lead in this farce. They come honestly by the clothes of an indigent thespian, but while they are in swimming an escaped convict (George Cooper) robs them and leaves a convict suit, an old dress and two barrels. Later he stumbles into their arms and they claim and get the reward. Because of the players, who are entertaining, the offering will amuse and be liked.

"LOW CAST BURMESE" (Vitagraph), October 22.—On the same reel with the foregoing farce is this series giving well-chosen and instructive views of lowly types among the Burmese. The photographs are very clear and the offering has an interesting humanity.

"DOROTHY'S ADOPTION" (Selig), October 22.—There is a clearly told story in this picture and it has qualities that hold interest. But we cannot say that the opening scene, in which a young couple lose their only child, is strongly acted. And as often happens when the picture begins weakly, the players find no point of setting out for truly human work and so much of the picture seems a bit artificial. The woman adopts a girl without the consent of her husband, but the child wins a right to remain.

"HIS FIRST PERFORMANCE" (Edison), October 22.—This farce by Milton Nobles made a decided hit and can be counted as a safe laugh-getter anywhere. There is no vulgarity of any kind in it. The fun is made mostly by Edward O'Connor and Jessie Stephens, as father and mother of Tommy (Edward Boulden), who makes "his first performance" in a Western melodrama at the opery house. The parents take the play too seriously, and as the melodrama is cleverly worked up to give them plenty of chance to be funny, the audience enjoys much hearty laughter. The whole picture is extremely well acted and managed throughout and is the best offering today. Charles France produced it.

"JAFFA, THE SEA PORT OF JERUSALEM AND ITS ORANGE INDUSTRY" (Edison), October 22.—On the same reel is this instructive and clearly photographed offering. It is a valuable and interesting contribution.

"DAY BY DAY" (Essanay), October 22.—A good, fresh picture idea was used in making this comedy offering. On Monday, the hero (Minor Watson), who is engaged to a society girl (Ruth Hennessy), learns that stocks have fallen and his fortune gone. The girl's mother (Gertrude Forbes) breaks the engagement brutally. The hero gets a job with his iceman (Wallace Beery), a comedy character very well acted, and meets the iceman's sister (Betty Brown) and mother. Then stocks go up and once more he is rich. The day he marries Betty, Ruth and her mother come in for a good snubbing. It makes a good, likable picture. We think Minor would hardly like to be the iceman. Those chunks looked heavy. Wallace toted his all right.

"DODGING MATRIMONY" (Patheplay), October 22.—The trials of a very badly hen-pecked man are the theme of this picture. His wife is a terror. Most of it is taken up with his comedy drunk antics and staggerings. There is amusement in it (to some audiences it will seem very funny) and some astonishing things like the flooding of a house from an overflowing bathtub.

"A RAILROADER'S WARNING" (Kalem), October 25.—Careful preparation and plot development bring this story of railroad life up to a very effective crisis. The two hobos rob the safe and bind the operator, but the latter pulls the telephone receiver down with his feet and calls the girl, who has charge of the exchange. The approaching train is saved from disaster and the thieves overtaken. A familiar series of incidents, but well put together and consistently acted. Denton Vane and Irene Boyle play the leads.

"BRONCHO BILLY'S ELOPEMENT" (Essanay), October 25.—This picture is not to be taken seriously. Broncho Billy's elopement was something far out of the ordinary. He held up his rival with a gun and made him take back the ring he had given the girl. Then he held up the reluctant minister and forced him to perform the marriage ceremony and afterward fought off the crowd of angry cowboys, led by the girl's father. The appearance of the three children six years later brought a laugh. The whole picture has an undercurrent of humor in it.

"MOTHER LOVE" (Lubin), October 25.—Good photography makes first appeal in this picture. It tells a very strong story and reaches an unusually successful climax. There are parts of the film which treat the subject of approaching maternity with unnecessary frankness; putting aside any prudish objections that might be made, a young wife's indisposition is not pleasing material for drama. The reconciliation scene was admirably done and the picture was nicely acted throughout. Albert Macklin, Vivian Bates, Lionel Adams and Maidel Turner are among those who appear.

"A PROPOSAL FROM NOBODY" (Edison), October 25.—In this fourth number of the "Who Will Marry Mary" series, the heroine finds herself in a far from pleasing predicament. Her rescue from the hands of Jacques, the half-crazy hunter of the Northwest, was dramatic and well pictured. We also enjoyed the ironic ending, wherein Duncan changes his mind about proposing. Mary Fuller, Frank McGlynn and Walter Edwin play the principal parts.

"THE MADONNA OF THE STORM" (Biograph), October 25.—One of the very best of recent releases. It attempts the type of story so often tried in films and succeeds most admirably. The observer watches the opening scenes with some misgivings, but when the picture of the Madonna and child is unwrapped and its influence upon the various characters is shown, it can be seen that this story touches life in many different phases. There is an allegorical tinge to the scenes where the demi-monde begins her pilgrimage toward the light, and bringing in the scrub woman was a touch of genius. A particularly fine offering.

"GYPSY LOVE" (Patheplay), October 25.—A finely pictured episode in gypsy life, very attractive with its admirable setting and capable handling. The gypsy girl was excellent in her strongly emotional part. She murdered the owner of the estate to get money for her dowry, in order that she might win the love of the chief's son. The tragic close was dramatic and well-acted by all concerned. A strong production from every point of view.

"DESTINY OF THE SEA" (Selig), October 24.—The sea seemed the most interesting factor in this picture. It was good. The story was nil; it was dull, listless, without a thrill in it.

"JIMMY'S FINISH" (Kalem), October 24.—There are some laughs over the mishaps following upon the attempt of John Brennan to fill a job as a newspaper photographer.

"BETTY BUTTIN AND THE BAD MAN" (Kalem), October 24.—On the same reel is this slightly longer comedy, in which a little girl gets into the jam closet. In her efforts to remove some of the outward marks she has placed upon her hands and face, she smears considerable woodwork, lending color to the rumor that the neighborhood is harboring one Gory Pete, a bad man. Adelaide Lawrence does very well as the little girl. A cook and a policeman also interest.

"BREEDING TROUT BY THE MILLION" (Patheplay), October 24.—This very interesting and instructive film certainly goes into details. The secrets of the hatchery are revealed, showing literally how millions are bred.

"HONFLEUR, AN OLD COAST TOWN OF NORTHERN FRANCE" (Patheplay), October 24.—On the same reel are these entertaining views of this ancient village. In the town are groups of dwellings six and seven stories in height; there are shown buildings four hundred years old and points of interest—all well photographed.

"THE MAN IN THE HAMPER" (Lubin), October 24.—The story sags during the first half or third, but gathers interest after that. The ending would have been stronger had the bad man been preserved, that justice might be done legally instead of permitting him to die of a wound in the arm.

"ON THEIR WEDDING EVE" (Vitagraph), October 24.—Rather slight basis to carry nearly a full reel. There is little in this picture to establish interest. The story is of a man and woman who quarrel on their wedding eve. The man goes east and the woman west. They are shown in different corners of the world. They collide in Bombay, and their differences are forgotten. "Feeding the Animals" is also on the same reel.

"SILAS MARNER" (Edison), October 24.—There are good situations in these two reels, and they are finely handled. There is a multiplicity of characters (sixteen are indicated in the published cast); this, of course, does not, as a general rule, make for interest. The closing scenes are strongly dramatic and with a touch of pathos, too. Many of Edison's star players are included in the cast.

"AN EVENING WITH WILDER SPENDER" (Biograph), Oct. 27.—Decidedly vulgar.

"ACROSS SWIFTCURRENT PASS" (Edison), Oct. 27.—A short film with good views of mountains. The audience was plainly interested.

"A HORNET'S NEST" (Edison), Oct. 27.—A short farce of simplicity that cannot be said to have got over very strongly. There was very little laughter where we saw it this morning. It felt the lack of convincing possibility. The script is by Mark Swan and Charles France produced it. The acting is fair; but none of the players will add much to his or her reputation by their acting in this picture.

"THE HIGHBORN CHILD AND THE BEGGAR" (Kalem), Oct. 27.—That graceful little actress, Adelaide Lawrence, is the life of this picture of sentiment and pathos. It illustrates a bit of verse which is not strong or very human; but is itself much better than this. If the story were told plainly, it would be ridiculous; but, like some rough urn, it holds an essence of pleasant odor and makes an acceptable offering. George Stewart plays the cripple boy.

"SPORTS IN MERRIE ENGLAND" (Kalem), Oct. 27.—On the same reel with the foregoing is this showing dogs and horses in action and some suffragettes on parade.

"THE MAN OF HIM" (Lubin), Oct. 27.—At its climax, this picture seems to be the most effective (judged by the quality of the audiences' attention) in some time. It shows a horse-thief, though pursued by a posse, stopping to rescue a child from quicksand. This is tremendously like the real thing in quicksand and the player is completely swallowed up by it. The spectators with breathless attention watched him go down while he holds up the child. The story to set this forth has been skillfully developed by George Terwilliger and produced by Edgar Jones. He also plays the horse-thief, but it is not a players' picture at all and stands on its quicksand scene. The child is played by Eleanor Dunn and Eleanor Blanchard plays her mother. Mart Heisey plays the father. A desirable offering.

"AT THE SIGN OF THE LOST ANGEL" (Vitagraph), Oct. 27.—Anne Schaefer plays the barmaid at the saloon of "The Lost Angel" with good strong emotional grip. But the story, by G. A. Pierce, is not vigorous except where the producer has put naturalness into the scenes or the players have put humanity into the characters; but this holds all the way through except at the end, where the heroine dies by throwing herself in front of the gun of her lover, who is aiming at the new minister of whom he is unjustly jealous. Rollin S. Sturgeon produced it. Anne Schaefer plays the heroine, Mr. Weston, the minister; Mr. Knukel, the lover and George Holt, the villain.

"A DAUGHTER OF THE WILDERNESS" (Edison), Oct. 28.—A picture made in the woods. If in the first half or more of the picture there is lacking strength it is atoned for in the ending scenes, which have real dramatic quality. Augustus Phillips and Mary Fuller play the leads. Richard Neill is a woodsman, and Frank McGlynn a priest. All are good.

"MAKING GOOD" (Lubin), Oct. 27.—A rather slight comedy and of the sort that hardly would happen outside of a burlesque show.

"GIVING BILL A REST" (Lubin), Oct. 28.—On the same reel is this other comedy. Mae Hotely in a bathing suit seems the best thing in it. The spectacle of a man carrying a suitcase and running behind a horse-drawn conveyance containing only his wife and the driver, who makes no attempt to stop his animal, is silly, not funny. So, too, the cry of "Help" from a bather in two feet of water is not convincing.

"THE SPINNERS OF SPEECH" (Patheplay), Oct. 28.—While this picture is catalogued as an industrial release, it might well have been classed as educational. Certainly it was interesting. The opening scenes were of a crew blazing a trail across the Rockies for telephone wires. There are many intimate views of the inside of telephone exchanges and descriptive subtitles. The subject is made more entertaining by reason of the introduction of a little trick photography, especially in explaining the long-distance call from Denver to New York.

"WHEN MAY WEDS DECEMBER" (Patheplay), Oct. 28.—A story of a young woman, who, under the influence of an impecunious mother, marries an aged man; the man has a villainous temper, and there will be few in any house who will not experience a desire to kick him in spite of his gray hairs, which as a matter of fact are much too transparent to be convincing. Of course, he dies before the story ends, but not nearly soon enough to give the picture a chance to be really entertaining.

"IN THE SHADOW" (Vitagraph), Oct. 28.—Mrs. Mary Maurice is featured in this picture. This fact alone goes far to make for the success of the subject. The story is a simple one; yet it is of a type with which this company is so successful. Mrs. Maurice portrays an old woman with one possession prized above all others—her wedding gown. When adversity comes she is obliged to accept an offer she has received for the garment from an antique hunter. She displays in her interpretation the intelligence and the charm which always characterize her work. Two children have important parts—Kenneth Casey and Dolores Costello. The latter is as lovable as ever; the former is permitted to overact. James Lackaye directs the picture.

"A DAUGHTER OF THE UNDERWORLD" (Kalem), October 22.—The story of this picture is melodramatic and so far as its general frame work goes has been used a number of times. But it shows careful thought in its preparation and has many fresh incidents and some excellent climaxes. The worst that can be said about it is that it starts out with the intention not only to convert the daughter of the slums, but to have her marry the minister—she doesn't in the picture quite; but in all stories like this she either does outright or it is made to seem as though she was going to. That chase of the crooks by cops over the roofs with the killing of one is finely produced and acted; not less so is the home-coming of the wounded father to die in pain. Then that ducking under the table in the dram shop of the unknown fugitive is another good bit. The offering has many such touches of realism that are commendable both to writer and to the company. It was asking a good deal of us to show us the minister as being arrested because a street tough and burglar has been found killed in his house. The ending required it and that is its reason. It is a well-acted offering. Paul Hurst, as the girl's brother, is the most convincing character; W. Herman West plays her father; the heroine is played by Billie Rhodes. Knute Rahm is a tough youth who "squeals" on the others. The minister is played by Carlyle Blackwell and Jane Wolfe plays his mother.

"THE EVIL EYE" (Lubin), October 23.—Romaine Fielding has written and produced a peculiar story in this two-reel picture. It is very interesting, but we don't believe that it will, in this neighborhood, grip many. There's a tang of old days in it, of times when some Don Quixote would sit with his cronies in the tap room and discourse of deep and interesting things. But the most remarkable thing about it is the suggestions of both old and new in the way it is pictured—one would almost think that its producer believed in what he was showing. One catches glimpses of sympathy for the unlettered peasant (a rare gift in a man who can read and write) and this quality gives it high value to the thoughtful and the sympathetic. The tale, as a tale, would have been, we think, much more interesting if the adjuncts of modern life, the modern clothes, the Quaker Oats, the boom town cottages, etc., had been left out. Yet it remains that the producer knows the country and this reviewer doesn't. Those first reel love scenes padded it noticeably; they seemed danced to slow music and were neither convincing or effective. The offering will be acceptable.

"THE DEATH SONG" (Patheplay), October 23.—This two-part offering deals with passions in a truthful, though not profound, way. There is nothing in it with which a moralist could find immediate and spontaneous fault; but the ground it grows in is not the best play ground for children. It seems to have been made in Germany and the role of heroine is played by Asta Neilson, who is well known to picture fans. She plays the wife of a temporary invalid, is a good singer, and finding it necessary to make money, goes on the stage under the direction of a famous composer. She swears to be true to her husband; yet falls in love with her impresario; lets him fondle her for a moment and then repulses him until, at the end, he, getting too impetuous, she has to stab him to death to save her oath. Then she walks tragically out of the hotel in the care of the police. Miss Neilson makes a striking figure with her black hair falling in masses around her ears and neck, and dressed in an extremely low-cut bodice of black silk made to fit as close as possible. Her acting is strong, but she plays in pantomime which (to American spectators) is not so effective as naturalness.

"THE LOVE LUTE OF ROMANY" (Essanay), October 24.—This gypsy subject is not strengthened by the use of two reels—it would have been better had it been shorter. The first reel contained much that bordered on the brutal, and in so far was not the best of entertainment. The second part carried good situations; one of deep human interest was where the gypsy girl left the home where she had been sheltered and laid on the note of departure a bracelet for the coming bride. Frank Dayton was strong as the chief of the gypsies. William Bailey, as the farmer, and Beverly Bayne, as his sweetheart, made much of their parts, as did Juanita Dalmorez as the gypsy girl. The backgrounds were selected with fine discrimination; they were of much natural beauty.

"THE NEXT GENERATION" (Vitagraph), October 25.—A well-wrought two-reel number, with Harry Morey, Rose Tapley, Leo Delaney and Edith Storey in the principal parts. It shows the manner in which the young ship builder becomes a greater expert than his uncle. The character of both these men was brought out strongly. It seemed improbable that the boat would be launched after the Board had been advised of its defective construction, but the subsequent scenes were dramatic and convincing. Sarah H. Starr is the author of the story which gets well off of the beaten track, a strong point in its favor.

"THE PENDULUM OF FATE" (Selig), Oct. 27.—A very good situation gives interest to this two-part offering. The story, though a few unconvincing incidents have been introduced in an attempt to make it exciting, has been pretty well developed as a melodrama; it holds well. The center of our interest lies in the family of a young earl who, just as he comes into the title and can publicly recognize his wife and children, is killed in a wreck. The marriage certificate has been hidden and is now lost. The earl's brother won't recognize the marriage as legitimate and turns the widow and her son and daughter out of their cottage. But the "pendulum of fate" or the swinging of a picture brings the document to light. There is a little awkwardness in the production, especially at the transitions in the action, and most noticeably where the widow cries "Search for the certificate." It is fairly, not brilliantly, acted. The authors are Winifred and Jacques Jensen and it was produced by Hardee Kirkland. Charles Clary plays the young earl; Henry Lansdale, his villainous brother (the best acted part in the picture); Elsa Lorimer, the earl's wife; William Stowell their son, and Miss Sage their daughter. Miss Pierce plays a minor role.

"THE RAJAH'S DIAMOND ROSE" (Eclipse), October 28.—In these two reels there is a story that will hold interest. It is of a man who has a bogus gem which he shows to the sons of rich men, at the same time indicating how the article can be revealed to view and, of course, possession secured. If any of the young men fall and attempt to steal the object they are blackmailed. A sister in her efforts to help a brother uncovers the crook and wins a sweetheart besides. The picture is well staged and photographed.

Independent.

"THE HAUNTED HOUSE" (American), November 8.—This story bears a strong resemblance to one we saw some time ago. It is a typical haunted house story, with opium smugglers and a love affair entangled in the plot. The girl, desiring to scare her lover, whom she has dared to remain in the house, is captured by the smugglers and later saved from being drowned by her lover. A fairly entertaining offering.

"FROM MINE TO MINT" (Powers), November 10.—A very pleasing educational subject, showing the manner in which gold coins are made. As the title indicates, the process is shown from the lowest depths of the mine and carried on very minutely until the actual double eagles are seen stacked in the mint. The photography might have been a little clearer in places, but this will make the average observer's eyes bulge with interest. A good release.

"THE GIRL AND THE GREASER" (American), November 3.—The characters in this release are neatly introduced by name and photograph and include Warren Kerrigan, Vivian Rich and Jack Richardson. The greaser invades the home of the wife and Dave's sister while the latter is ill. He steals the money and tries to set fire to the house. The wife stamps out the flames and pursues the greaser, holding him up by a clever trick with his own revolver. The ending was not very strong.

"TWO MEN AND A MULE," Series 2 (Reliance), October 29.—In this number Steve and Jake again appear as a pair of interesting hoboes. The mule, however, cuts little figure in the story and therefore the title seems out of place. The humor of this, which is not overly strong, consists of the experiences of the tramps in a hotel and later in moving a piano.

"WHAT HER DIARY TOLD" (American), November 6.—The girl in this story accepts John, who has money, in preference to Harold, whom she really loves. Later, when John has learned the truth from her diary and gone away, she nurses him after an accident and learns to love him. Vivian Rich, Edward Coxen and George Field appear in this; the latter suggested interesting possibilities in his "store" clothes and we would like to see more of him in this garb.

"THE REAL MOTHER" (Reliance), October 29.—A conventional story, showing the manner in which a young girl yields to persuasions to come to the city and live a gay life. During her first city party she becomes homesick and decides to go back to her country home. The photography is pleasing and the story interesting in its way.

"THE SMALL TIME ACT" (Keystone), November 10.—An amusing half reel in which Ford Sterling gives burlesque imitations of a tight rope walker, a juggler, a prize fighter and a magician. Of course, trouble ensues with his audience and some laughter is created by the situations.

"THE MILK WE DRINK" (Keystone), November 10.—An educational subject, depicting the changes in the manner dairy work is done. The dairy was not quite as modern in some respects as others shown on the screen, but the pictures are interesting. On same reel with above.

"A TWENTIETH CENTURY FARMER" (Thanhouser), October 31.—A very pleasing number, with Florence LaBadie and William Russell in the leads. She falls in love with him, knowing he is a farmer, but her first glimpses of his model dairy, the duck pond, the shower baths for the pigs, and other modern improvements were a surprise. They also furnish information to observers of the film, which has made clever use of these modern farm attributes. An enjoyable release.

"LOBSTER SALAD AND MILK" (Princess), October 24.—A good little story of a bad little girl, who got into sister's rouge and other toilet articles. She even went so far as to "fix up" the dogs. Later she indulges in salad and milk, which leads up to a most alarming nightmare. Good entertainment of the kind and nicely pictured.

"THE OLD PARLOR" (Imp), Nov. 6.—"Pop" Hoadley has written a story of human interest which William Robert Daly has produced. A young couple are married. From the country they go to the city and prosper. The wife meets gay women friends and the two are estranged. The wife's parents, in order to effect a reconciliation, transfer from the old home the furniture of the parlor and set it up in a room in the city house. When the two are brought together in the old surroundings their differences are forgotten and they start life on a new basis. The picture will interest throughout.

Independent Specials.

"THE HAND THAT CONDEMNS" (Warner's Features).—These three reels, made by the Milano Company, contain much that is worthy of praise. The photography is excellent, and is enhanced by good tinting of scenes. The story is of a dissolute son who involves in his misdeeds the secretary of his father secretly wedded to a sister. There is a decided detective story turn toward the end, all of which is interesting. There are good settings and good acting.

"LADY OF THE LAKE" (Warner's Features).—This picture is in three reels and is made by the Whitman-Warren Company, under the brand of Juno films. It seems to be more an attempt to picturize the poem than to use the work as a basis for a drama. There are a vast number of titles—so many that the production loses in strength. While it will afford pleasure to those who may recall the outline of the story it is doubtful if it will hold those who have no knowledge of the book. There is a lack of cohesiveness or centralization of interest.

"THE OATH OF O TSURU SAN" (Majestic), October 28.—The most thoroughly pleasing two-reel Japanese-American subject the writer has seen. The settings are perfect, both as regards interiors and the garden scenes. Moreover, Tsuru Aoki proves a very delightful and intelligent screen artist. One could not blame the hero, portrayed by William Garwood, for marrying her and carrying her off to America, even though this placed the plans of the new invention in jeopardy. Ernest Joy and the Japanese men were also good. As dainty and attractive as Madame Butterfly, finely photographed and tells a story that holds the attention well. An exceptional Japanese subject.

"THE END OF THE ROAD" (Gem), November 7.—A two-reel subject adapted from Bulwer Lytton's novel "Ernest Maltrovers," by Jack Byrne, and produced by William Robert Daly. There is plenty of plot in this and the film is entertaining. The story develops somewhat jerkily; there was nothing to indicate that Dick's love for Dora was of an illicit nature until the child is suddenly brought into the picture. Neither was her marriage to Sloane made clear enough. The photography is uneven but generally good. In spite of numerous faults in development the production maintains the interest.

"THE BARRIER OF BLOOD" (Ammex).—In these two reels of Western stuff there are good situations, but the story as a whole is not strong, and at times it is unpleasant. The theme is the refusal of a parent to sanction a marriage between a daughter and a half breed. The man, in order to make it easier for the girl to release him, tries to sacrifice her regard through bad behavior, thereby adding nothing to the dramatic value of the story and actually weakening it. The tinting for the night scenes was indifferently done.

"THE GALLOWS OF THE GODS" (F. R. A.).—Three reels made by the Kinograf Company of Copenhagen. The story is a pronounced melodrama, and especially may this characterization be applied to the villain. There are several sensational incidents, but the picture does not get any particular hold on the observer.

WALTER MACNAMARA, DIRECTOR.

Walter MacNamara.

Walter MacNamara is the latest to be added to the extensive staff of Universal directors. For the past year he has been connected with the Universal as special photoplay writer and for the past few months has been acting in the double capacity of assistant-director and author.

Mr. MacNamara has had a notable record as a film author, having turned out scores of successes, practically creating the Binks series. He has written King Baggot's successes and most of the later successes of Miss Jane Gail.

Irish by birth, he is known throughout that country as a politician. At present Mac has four condensed musical comedies on the road in this country and scores of them playing in England. He was one of the first vice-presidents of the Gaelic League and one of the founders of the Irish Club in London. His experience has been varied and wide and his training in the film game has been thorough. A firm believer in the future of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, he brings to his present work an enthusiasm that should produce results unusual.

REAL BULL FIGHT IN KLEINE-CINES TWO REEL.

When Director Guazzoni, of the Cines Company, went to Spain some months ago, he engaged a troupe of Spanish players, and before leaving with the company for Rome, took advantage of a great fete day at Seville, Spain, and produced a remarkable two-reel subject, which centers around a gala day bull fight. Into the thread of a love story typically Spanish, the great bull ring with its tens of thousands of devotees was used. Aside from the immense throngs who are seen in the picture and the quaint costumes of the people and old-fashioned narrow streets of the ancient city, one gets all the thrills of the spectator at the game. Two beautiful horses are bowled over upon the horns of a bull, and the bull is himself killed without ever once getting out of the camera's scope. The great stands, larger than those of any American baseball park, are filled tier upon tier with excited, shouting enthusiasts. The production of this picture was an extremely daring piece of work, and it is believed that American picture fans will appreciate and understand the considerable amount of work and trouble involved in its making.

Aviation and Acting

Tony Jannus, One of the Pioneer Bird Men Thinks that Aviators in Pictures Should Be Better Actors.

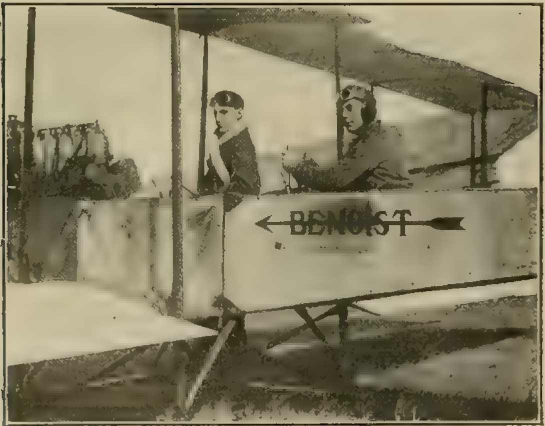
By Hugh Hoffman.

FOR a little while, one day last week, all business at the Moving Picture World office was at a complete standstill. The entire force was gazing skyward through the windows. The occasion of this sudden cessation of labor was the passing of the New York Times Aerial Derby, high over the skyline of Manhattan. It was a windy day, and a bad one for that kind of business; so bad that only five aviators out of a possible 17 entries made the start at all. One of the starters was Antony Jannus, the intrepid young highflyer who stands high in the estimation of the really scientific members of his profession.

Antony Jannus.

At that great height we did not recognize "Tony," nor did he recognize us, but he came into the office next day to tell us all about it. Nobody would ever suspect Antony Jannus of being a professional aviator. On Broadway he would pass much easier for a handsome "juvenile" with some current theatrical attraction. There is a good deal of the "boy" in him despite the tremendous responsibility of his work. At the very old age of twenty-four he is considered an old timer in the game. Seven years in the aviation business is a record that few men can show. That takes us back to the early flights of the Wright Brothers in Washington, D. C.

Tony was a schoolboy at that time, taking a course in mechanics and engineering at the technical high school in that city. Rex Smith sent a requisition to the school for a batch of boys to be sent down to the experimenting field to qualify as "sky pilots." There were only two out of twenty who qualified, and young Jannus was one of the two. At that time there were no more than twenty known air chauffeurs in America, including the Wrights. Of that twenty there are only five left who are making flights. The others either died or were killed or, as Antony puts it, "lost their nerve."



About to Start Searching for Aviator Jewell. Tony Jannus, Pilot; J. R. Hall, Observer.

It is only during the past year and a half that Jannus has been making exhibition flights. By virtue of his technical education, he drifted into the experimental and designing ends of the business and eventually became one of the foremost designers of aircraft. He is now one of the principal stockholders of the Benoist Aircraft Company, of St. Louis, Missouri.

When away from his home it has been his diversion to spend some of his evenings at the moving picture show. Occasionally there would appear a picture in which an airship of some kind played a prominent part. These were nearly all a disappointment to him because of the very obvious substitution of an aviator for an actor or vice versa. Besides this fault there was the awkwardness with which the machines are usually handled. It gave him much pain when he thought the aeronant was coming up in front of the camera to really do something, only to fly out of the picture at the most interesting moment.

"Of course, I understand why this is done," said Tony, meditatively. "It is mostly because the pilot would be recognized and in that case the illusion would be lost to the audience. Another reason is that many men who are picking up easy money with aircraft, are not expert enough to make a machine do what they want it to do. Among the higher circles of aviators these men are considered merely as 'showmen' and seldom or never appear at any of the scientific councils of the profession. But assuming that they are top notch pilots, their usual lack of histrionic ability must necessarily keep them up-stage to a very great extent. All this has jarred upon me to such an extent that I have an idea that I would like to combine my former theatrical experience with my ability to handle an airship and see if something with real dramatic value cannot be produced along those lines."

"Then you are an actor as well?" was the question put to him.

"Oh! yes, I have done my bit at that" he replied. "I found the stage a convenience to help me out in my studies, and I didn't always carry a spear either, I had some pretty good parts. Lately I have been writing scenarios introducing the aeroplane in many situations, even in comedy, but the trouble is to find an actor who can handle the flying machine, or the other way around. When I see some of the aeroplane work in the movies it makes me weep and wonder why things are as they are, and at the present moment I am worked up to such a pitch, over the misrepresentation that aviation has received in moving pictures, that I hope to take a little 'flyer' at it myself. Why shouldn't I, when I have a stable of flying machines at my disposal, including aeroplanes, hydroplanes, the flying boat, and, above all, the inclination? In looking around New York I have observed some opportunities for doing stunts, where the camera can get them, that would make the whole world sit up and take notice."

EDUCATIONAL FILM IN JAPAN.

The Government of Japan has been quick to recognize the educational film as a means of spreading knowledge among the masses. It has just sent out a circular to the producers of motion pictures throughout the world, inviting them to submit their educational films for official inspection and approval. It is a natural inference that films thus "recognized" by the Deparement of Education will be readily received in the schools of the country. The regulations issued by the government are published in full:

Article I. The manufacturers of, and dealers in films for cinematographs, and persons engaged in showing the films, may apply to the Department of Education for official sanction of those films which they may judge embody the principle of popular education, presenting to the department samples of such films, together with a list of the moving pictures and explanatory statements connected therewith.

Article II. The films presented to the authorities as indicated above, shall in accordance with the request of the applicants, be returned to the latter, but the authorities will in no way hold themselves responsible for any damage the films may sustain while in the hands of the authorities.

Article III. All expenses connected with the above process shall be borne by the applicants.

Article IV. Those films officially sanctioned by the authorities shall be inscribed with the words, "Recognized by the Education Department," but this indorsement will not hold to any films altered after their official examination.

Article V. The titles of those films recognized by the authorities, together with the name of applicants, shall be published in the Official Gazette.

ATLAS THEATER CO. OPENS ANOTHER HOUSE.

The latest addition to the already growing chain of motion picture houses owned by the Atlas Theater Company, 1888 Third Avenue, New York City, is the Dome theater, situated at 2148 Third Avenue, New York City. This house, which is modern in every respect, measures 50 feet by 135 feet. Mr. E. Rosenbaum, of the Atlas Theater Company, says that it is the first six hundred seat house in Harlem, the district in which the new house is located. The operating room is fitted with three Simplex machines which are kept alternately running. The Atlas Company expects to open a few more picture houses in the near future.

Twist Gives Gabfest.

Has Small Dinner at Cafe de Paris and Announces His Connection with E. Mandelbaum's Enterprises.

ABOUT a month ago Stanley H. Twist, for a long time chief publicity man for the Selig Polyscope Company, slipped into New York and, after passing the glad hand around among his several friends in the big town, intimated that he would have something to reveal a bit later. The next we heard from Stanley came in the form of an invitation to a little dinner party at the Cafe de Paris on Wednesday evening, October 22. (Notice that Cafe de Paris?) We went to the Cafe de Paris and were lifted swiftly to a private dining room up near the roof of the big restaurant on 42nd Street, where were already assembled the smiling Stanley, Miss Mabel Condon, Fred Beecroft, George Procter, Joe Farnham, Arthur Leslie, W. A. Johnson, E. Mandelbaum, and Ernest Shipman. Greetings were exchanged and the party sat down to a delightful repast.

Stanley H. Twist.

When the menu had been sufficiently discussed and coffee and cigarettes had been passed, conversation turned upon picture topics. It was then that Mr. Twist announced his connection with the enterprises of Mr. E. Mandelbaum. The latter has been operating a feature film business in Cleveland, Ohio, for some time together with several high class picture theaters. Recently he organized the World's Special Film Corporation and the Pompeii Film Company, with offices in the World's Tower Building in 40th Street. The extensive nature of these several enterprises called for the services of a high class and experienced publicity man with creative ability, so it did not take long for Mr. Mandelbaum and Mr. Twist to get together after they had canvassed the situation.

E. Mandelbaum.

While Mr. Twist will have a general supervision over all of the Mandelbaum interests, his attention will be devoted principally to the Pompeii Film Company at present. This is the concern that is handling the big Pasquali production, "The Last Days of Pompeii," now being booked by Pat Casey over the Klaw & Erlanger circuit. Extensive plans for the exhibition of this subject have been formulated. Several shows will be put on the road, each equipped with two projection machines and all other necessary paraphernalia. Two operators and an advance man and manager will go with each show. A big line of new paper and advertising has been prepared. The No. 1 show will open in Indianapolis on Sunday, November 2. The second show will open in Newark, N. J., soon.

Aside from the bookings over the K. & E. circuit of legitimate houses, arrangements have been made to lease this production to other good theaters and the larger motion picture houses.

So much for Stanley's plans. From that subject the conversation at the little dinner drifted to the general subject of better pictures, which kept the party interested until the small hours. It was an altogether delightful occasion.

Herbert Brenon Returns from Europe.

Imp Director Talks Interestingly of His Observations During a Six Months' Tour.

HERBERT BRENON, the Imp director who has been making pictures abroad, arrived home on October 28. With him during the entire trip was Mrs. Brenon. He was away an even six months. In that time he produced dramas in England, France, Austria and Germany. His first picture, a three-reel "Ivanhoe," made a record of 109 prints in London, which, as some one has described it, is "the hardest market in the world." Mr. Brenon was very much impressed by what he observed in the film marts of the British metropolis, where from all parts of the world come every week for inspection and sale on merit 600,000 feet of film. "To a producer," said Mr. Brenon, "it is the greatest lesson conceivable to watch the viewers of pictures sit down and pick each film to pieces. They seem to uncover every mistake made by the manufacturer. Very often it is the little thing which may have been noticed in the studio, but which is permitted to stand in the belief that it will get over, that is responsible for the rejection of the entire subject and the loss of the sale. To a man in the game it is a real stimulus to listen to the discussions of these men; it is bound to make him keener and to urge him to do his best in the little things as well as the greater. As a matter of fact, no director can go abroad with eyes and ears ordinarily alert without gaining much knowledge that is bound to be to the distinct advantage of himself and his company as well.

Herbert Brenon

"I believe that the day of the one-reel picture is passing," continued Mr. Brenon; "not by that that the day of padding the one-reel subject to two-reel length is here. Far from it. The longer film must contain the elements of the better picture—the story, the settings and backgrounds, the photography and the big situations. As to exhibiting, I think Germany in general and Berlin in particular lead the world. There they are strong for three-hour performances. The programs are balanced with judgment. They bank strong on scenics, and they have good ones. Take one of the big houses, for instance. It will open up at 9 o'clock in the evening with a scenic. Then there will be shown a two or three reel drama of strength, then a one-reel drama, then a short comedy, and then the big feature of the night, a three or four part subject. The picture houses in Germany compete with the regular theaters and they charge and get good prices, as high in some instances as $1.00 or $1.50, and range down to 25 cents. The houses are filled. There are magnificent orchestras and splendid projection. As to methods of production I think the Germans, French and Italians have some things to show us.

"No picture man can spend a half year in England and on the continent without coming back with broader views, greater ambition, a finer and keener sense of artistic values and a better knowledge of the technical points that count so big in staging a picture."

Certainly Mr. Brenon comes back strong in health as he is enthusiastic in spirits. He does not need to tell you that his tour has been a tonic to him. Among the pictures made by the Universal director while away were, in London, "Across the Atlantic," in three reels; in Paris, the one-reel "Anarchist," already released; "Absinthe," in three reels, and "Child Stealers of Paris," two reels; in Germany, "Love or a Throne," "Time Is Money" and "Love and a Lottery Ticket," all three-part subjects.

Returning with Mr. Brenon also were William E. Shay and Miss Leah Baird, who have been playing leads, and Julius Stern, the manager of the company.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

THERE was opened in Brooklyn on the evening of October 24 the new Nostrand Theater. It is one of the first of the houses in New York City to be enlarged from the 299-seat basis to 600 seats. We were favored by friend Machat with an invitation to attend the initial showing of pictures. Mr. Machat has expended $10,000 to rebuild his house, and the result is worth while. First of all, the projection is excellent. Two Power's 6-A motor-driven machines, on a nearly flat throw of eighty-five feet, provide fine clear pictures. The gradient of the floor has been changed to one foot in ten, allowing every one a good view of the screen. Two boxes, containing thirty chairs each, are at the back of the theater; the price of these seats is 20 cents, double the regular admission. There is an up-to-date ventilation plant, providing fresh air in abundance. The chairs are cushioned and comfortable, there being ample room between rows. Six wall lamps furnish illumination during the projection of the pictures, while ten large lamps of the indirect type may be brought into use during intermissions. The steam pipes are arranged along the wall, well out of the reach of the small boy. The decorations are in red, divided into sections by large white frames. The screen is inclosed in a black border. On the extreme left of the entrance is a cosey women's retiring room, while on the right provision is made for the sterner sex. The ceiling is metal, painted white. Music is furnished by a violinist and pianist. The service will be five reels of General Film Exclusive, which will be changed every other day, and three reels of Mutual. One show will be given in the afternoon, beginning at 2:30. The evening performance will begin at 6:30; the second show will begin at 9 or 9:15, terminating about 11. In spite of the fact that the house had been closed three months, there were over 1,100 paid admissions on the opening night and many were turned away. A heavy rain was falling all the evening. To bring out his people Mr. Machat had present Maurice Costello, who related experiences of the Vitagraph tourists in the trip around the world. The house has been filled at all subsequent performances, which shows that a community is quick to appreciate enterprise on the part of an exhibitor. Mr. Machat deserves his success.

Jack J. Clark tells a story illustrating the dangers of seeking realism in pictures, especially when dealing with a real Irishman on his native soil. Mr. Clark is of Irish extraction and takes deep interest in all that pertains to the Emerald Isle, especially in matters of history. This interest has been sharpened by the visits he has made to the island as a member of picture companies. During the recent trip of the Gene Gauntier players scenes were being taken outside of Killarney. The subject was an eviction and the period a half century ago. Director Olcott had asked Mr. Clark to go into the village and select peasant types. There was to be an assault on the soldiers—and, of course, there was no difficulty in getting the people desired when the object was explained. Among those engaged was Dan Larkin, a sturdy old man who, in the course of more than eighty years, had witnessed many stirring events. The headquarters of the company was in a tavern. It is suspected that before the scenes were taken old Dan had visited the bar. Dan had been provided with a stout shillalah, to use on the soldiers, but he had been warned not to hurt them. The warning was ignored, however, when the time for action arrived. The old man forgot all about the camera or the fact that he was an actor. He saw only red coats, and a head above every one of them. He was back again in the days of his youth, fighting bitter enemies. The big club, with a knob on the end as big as two fists, was swinging as fast and as hard as the rejuvenated muscles of an old-time scrapper could wield it. The men in the red coats, not being prepared for any such attack, were bowled over left and right. The thoroughly aroused Irishman was only subdued when the entire party made him the object of their undivided attention. There was immediate use for much arnica and courtplaster.

Hobart Bosworth certainly fitted into the part of Wolf Larsen, the brutal skipper of Jack London's "Sea Wolf." He has the physique, the dramatic experience—camera as well as stage—and the age to play the part without resorting to makeup. One of the incidents in the picture that will make a house sit up is the appearance of the sharkfin. The sailors have complained to the captain that the cook is negligent, untidy, and that he supplies them with poor food. "Put a rope on him, throw him astern and give him a washing," says the skipper. It is done with many manifestations of joy. The sub-title of "Washing Cookie," is greeted with laughter by the house, as the unpopular boss of the galley is shown floundering in the boat's wake. Then you see a flash of a sharkfin. The comedy is automatically and instantly shut off. There is potential tragedy in that bit of fin. As the sailors frantically haul in the nearly submerged cook there are flashbacks to the fin. You feel the shark is after his man. When the half-drowned victim is taken on board the feeling is well established that the tale in the book has been exemplified—that a foot is missing. There is instant diversion, however, in the placing of a big piece of pork on a hook and the ensuing capture of the maneater.

If Uncle Sam wants to provide real entertainment for his sailor boys he will do well to put "The Sea Wolf" in circulation among his warships. Can you picture hundreds of a dreadnought's crew sitting on deck watching the unfolding of this seven-reel story of the ocean? Paint in your own accessories and side lights—the sea, the starlit sky, and all the other factors of such a situation. It would be worth seeing.

Epes Sargent thinks he has the record for an outstanding script that finally "lands." The elapsed time from submission to acceptance is two years and twelve days. The original copy was lost by the producer, and a carbon was sent. Then the carbon was mislaid and a second carbon was supplied. Then the original was found. It was only recently that Director Hotaling, of the Lubin Company, decided that the script that had been so long on the shelf would just fit in. Consequently Sargent wears his most grim-smile. Certainly one who is so good a waiter deserves to be no loser.

Syracuse, N. Y., is to have a picture censor. He will be named by the commissioner of public safety, himself a regular attendant at a picture show. The commissioner says he does not recollect seeing any films that were particularly bad. He admits the line will have to be drawn very fine sometimes to distinguish between the good and bad, especially in "adventure pictures" and what he describes as "lovey-dovey romance" stuff. He very wisely says the selection of the right man for the work is about the most important part of the whole matter. The commissioner says the exhibitors who would not hesitate to show films they know to be bad, provided they thought their business would be improved, are very few and that it ought not to take long to discover them.

When Mayor Rose, of Los Angeles, was asked by a member of the board of censors to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Paul M. Powell, he said very emphatically that he did not propose to do any such thing. "In fact," he added, "I don't care if they all resign their positions, for I don't see any use of having such a commission. The matter can be handled by the police. Let every patrolman keep tab on the moving picture shows on his beat. If he sees a film that is not right let him report to headquarters."

ANOTHER POWERS ENTERPRISE ON THE ROCKS.

A petition in bankruptcy has been filed against the Independent Exchange Company, manufacturer of motion picture machines and films, at 220 West Forty-second Street, by these creditors: Joseph A. McKinney, $3,100, of which $900 is salary as manager, and $2.200 breach of contract; Schilling Press, $27, and Reyer & Ninger, $21. It was alleged that the company was insolvent, had made preferential payments, $500, and had transferred merchandise, valued at $1,000. Liabilities are said to be $9,000, and assets $1,000.

The Independent Exchange Company was formed by P. A. Powers, William Oldknow, Frank Bailey and other independent exchange owners with the purpose of controlling the "independent" market. The plan was a "flivver" from its inception.

BUYS INTEREST IN PICTURE HOUSE.

Mrs. E. J. Fisher has purchased the interest of Messrs. Bertrand & Pigeon in the Dreamland theater, Twentieth Street, Saskatoon, Sask, Canada. Mr. Fisher will be the manager and musical director. The house plays high class features and another feature will be the music. Mr. Fisher is well versed in music and will see that the patrons are asgiven the right kind of music to the right kind of picture.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"THE PRICE OF VICTORY" (Lubin).

Probably of all terrible stories of the Civil War, this is the most dramatic and pitiful. Nothing but the mad insanity of battle could induce such a fearful sacrifice. A life counts little in war, but the life that was given was worth more than the advantage of conquest and is beyond compensation. It is a powerful lesson against the horrors of the battle field. The photoplay does much credit to John Ince and Miss Rosetta Brice, who played the leading roles.

Colonel Robert Carey, a young southerner, and Lorena Gray, his sweetheart, have a lovers' quarrel and before they can make up Carey is ordered to the front. Carey is on the staff of General Jackson. Lorena joins the Secret Service and is also ordered to report to Jackson. As she approaches the headquarters she can hear the cannons and realizes that a fierce battle is in progress. Jackson has ordered the destruction of a bridge across Cold Creek, the mine is laid but the Confederates are not given time to explode it before the Union men begin to cross. Carey agrees to swim and explode the mine, but is wounded by a sharpshooter. At this moment he is found by Lorena and a joyous reconciliation takes place. Carey, unable to proceed, remembers his mission and Lorena offers to take his place. Carey knows it is sure death to her, but for the cause agrees to let her explode the mine. As the Union soldiers are pouring across, the girl fires the mine. Her life is the price she pays for the victory. Through the bloody years that follow Carey is ever in the front of the battle, but the swift death he prays for passes him by. The war is ended and fifty years pass when Carey makes his way to the grave of his girlish sweetheart and falls asleep to find the weary waiting ended.

Scene from "The Price of Victory" (Lubin).

WESTERN PICTURES ON EXCLUSIVE PROGRAM.

Western features, long wanted to balance the Exclusive Supply Corporation program, will now be available in abundance, three companies releasing aggregately between six and eight features monthly, have signed contracts with the Exclusive. One of the companies, the Ammex, is not unknown, but the two others, the Laclede and Great Western brands will start fresh. From the viewpoint that a new broom sweeps clean and considering that their personnel includes men of wide experience and established reputation, their outlook is cheerful. All three companies will begin releasing in the early part of November and judging by the high quality of the samples shown privately in the Exclusive's projection room, their product will be well received.

"A BOGUS HERO" (Great Northern).

Tom was the sort of hero that never did and never will make good. While wandering along the beach one afternoon he saw a young man fall into shallow water and immediately proceeded to "the rescue." Tom got his feet wet, but Henry, the rescued one, was so grateful that he invited the hero to the home of his parents, who are wealthy. It is the softest snap in his life and he proceeds to take advantage of the situation to the utmost. Henry and family are delighted with the bogus hero, because his manners are eccentric and they invite his parents to visit the mansion. When Tom's parents arrive they proceed to take possession of the place and enjoy the hospitality extended them to the utmost. They are dined and wined and Tom's dad smokes up the most expensive cigars he ever had put his lips over. Mamma investigates the mysteries of the silver cabinet and the art collection and all goes well until the time for departure arrives. Then it is that Henry's sweetheart, who has been a close, but silent observer, exposes the sham hero and his relatives. Hidden in their clothing are silver knives, spoons and forks, rare cigars and dainty bits of bric-a-brac. The finale may readily be imagined when Tom, the bogus hero, is ejected from the house and his parents are requested to follow him. Considering that it is a comedy subject, there is much beautiful photography and some splendid acting.

Scene from "A Bogus Hero" (Gt. Northern).

"IN THE DAYS OF TRAJAN" (American).

In his coming release of "In the Days of Trajan," Lorimer Johnston, the director of the first company of the American at Santa Barbara, Cal., has written a stirring and vital story of old Rome. In it he shows the pomp and power of the great Emperor Trajan, scenes of the Circus Maximus, with the fight between the gladiators and the barbarians, culminating with an attack on the emperor by the gladiators, who leap from the arena into the imperial box (an absolutely new situation). Then is shown an imperial triumph where the captive queens, kings and princes are led through the streets of Rome to the imperial throne. All of these scenes were taken in the palaces owned by the residents of Santa Barbara and the adjacent Montecito, which are absolute reproductions of the Roman period in which the story is laid. The Miller-Graham place provided the marble throne and the carved marble throne chairs. The entire production marks another departure in the American Company and in costuming and effects will compare with anything of the kind done in the United States.

"OUTLAWED" (Film Releases of America).

"Outlawed!" The very word gives one the shivers, conjuring pictures of the stern arm of the law reaching inexorably after him who has or who is supposed to have violated its laws. The meshes of the law in the rugged wilds are not so open as they are in the effete cities and accordingly our perfectly innocent hero in this three reel photofeature has troubles of his own and other people's in keeping away from the clinging coils of the hangman's noose.

Scene from "Outlawed" (Film Releases).

The treatment and variety of the theme rather than the theme itself makes the feature praiseworthy. The girl in the story frequently becomes the "man of the hour" and even dons the masculine trousers when masquerade is necessary to keep her from molestation at the hands of the mountain bandits. A "quick on the trigger" lady she is and when her sweetheart is wounded she fires away right merrily at the desperadoes and wings many a one.

Scenically and photographically the picture is excellent.

"THE DRUMMER'S HONEYMOON" (American).

A novel little sketch taken from every day life in which Ed. Coxen, Winnifred Greenwood and George Field divide honors equally and a fair portion of the glory is allowed to go to Wm. Tedmarsh, who does a clever piece of work in the part he carries.

The story is that of a traveling salesman on a honeymoon trip. His office manager intercepts him by wire with instructions to head off a certain buyer stopping at a summer resort for a vacation. The salesman is jobbed by the prospective customer with whom he is not acquainted, but fortunately his wife does know him and accidentally meets him basking in the sunshine of smiles other than those of his wife. When the salesman learns of the trick played on him he appears considerably exercised over it, but the wife gallantly comes to the rescue by forcing the placing of a large order. The story is interesting throughout and well handled.

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH AT ELECTRICAL EXPOSITION.

Electricity was the big noise at the Grand Central Palace, New York, October 15th to the 25th inst. The Nicholas Power Company, progressive purveyors of moving picture projectors, were there with an interesting exhibit of their Cameragraph No. 6 and No. 6A and their dissolving stereopticon. Also they had an interesting exhibit comprising a smoke box in which were condensing and projection lenses. An arc light was projected through these, and by means of the smoke it was made evident how light rays are focused and projected on the screen.

FRANK WOODS GOES WITH MUTUAL.

Frank Woods, well known to picture men and women as "Spectator" of the Dramatic Mirror, and more recently in charge of the scenario department of the Biograph Company, has resigned from the latter organization to join the staff of Lawrence Griffith in the Mutual Company. Mr. Woods will be at the head of the Mutual's script department.

A CORRECTION.

In the Lubin Film Company's advertisement on page 467 of last week's issue, it was stated that that company was making in three reels the film entitled "The Sea Eternal." This is an error; the picture is but two reels in length.

"THE LURE OF NEW YORK" (Four Reels).

The New York Film Company have just released a four-reel feature entitled "The Lure of New York." A clever young woman from one of the East Side theaters has been engaged to play the principal part, which is that of a young immigrant girl who comes to New York and successfully resists all the temptations to join the vast procession of unfortunates. The picture follows substantially a scenario written by A. Danziger, the president of the New York Film Company. The director was Mr. Rolands. The studio of the Pilot Company was used for the indoor settings. There are some pretty scenes of New York and its surroundings. Mr. B. L. Feinblatt, of the Standard Feature Film Company, has acquired the New York City and State rights on "The Lure of New York."

Scene from "The Lure of New York."

UNIVERSAL STARTS BIG ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN.

At a recent meeting of the directors of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, a resolution was adopted appropriating the sum of $250,000 to be spent during the coming year in advertising Universal pictures. This appropriation will be handled by the Witt K. Cochrane Advertising Agency of Chicago. Newspapers, magazines, billboards and miscellaneous mediums will be employed. This publicity will be supplementary to the trade paper and other advertising now being employed by the company.

FAMOUS PLAYERS' LONDON MANAGER.

The European organization of the Famous Players Film Company, with headquarters at 84 Charing Cross Road, W. C., London, has been placed in charge of Mr. Sidney M. Baber, one of the best-known men in the film trade in England. It is Mr. Baber's intention of making his premises among the most comfortable in London, and his boast is that he will make his receptions so pleasant for his intended clients that they will be eager to visit him, and with the Famous Players' productions to exhibit he is not in the least afraid of any competition he may have to face.

FLORENCE LAWRENCE IN JEWISH ROLE.

Florence Lawrence, the famous screen star being featured in Universal-Victor plays, has departed from her usual roles and promises her admirers a surprise when they see her in "The Third Generation," written by Walter MacNamara. She plays the part of a modern New York Jewish girl. There is the eternal clash of creed and race. This is a big story under preparation by Director Harry Salter.

AGNES EGAN COBB RETURNS FROM TRIP.

Agnes Egan Cobb, motion picture saleswoman for Union Features and the new "Feature Ideals" of the Eclair Company, has just returned from a western trip greatly pleased with the result. Miss Cobb visited Pittsburgh, Columbus, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Indianapolis and St. Louis, returning on Thursday, October 28.

"WHAT EIGHTY MILLION WOMEN WANT—?"

Under this title the Unique Film Company presents to the public its new four-reel "unique" feature. This film play presents for the first time to the public the leaders of the suffrage movement in England and the United States, viz.: Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst, the great militant suffragette of England, and Mrs. Harriet Stanton Blatch, the famous president of the Women's Political Union of the United States, both of whom in order to show their appreciation of a serious presentation of a drama in which the suffrage movement plays an important part, have for the first time taken active part in a photodrama. The name of this feature surely is "unique." It naturally causes one to ask the question, "What Eighty Million Women Want—?" and to seek in their own minds the answer. The average man has enough trouble trying to solve what one woman wants.

Scene from Unique Feature with Mrs. Pankhurst.

The name of this subject is good. The story of the film is even better. It is a timely political drama of the present day. The story is laid in and about New York City at the time of the primaries and just prior to election. A hot political fight is in progress. The Women's Political Union has become a powerful factor and is waging a war of extermination against Kelly, the corrupt political boss. Scene after scene is shown of the opposing factions in this active campaign. The suffragette who plays the lead is affiliated with the Women's Political Union and is an active supporter of the cause. Its president, Mrs. Harriet S. Blatch, takes a prominent part in the campaign. Mrs. Pankhurst, who comes on a visit here, is also actively affiliated with the union and joins in the campaign to down the corrupt boss and to aid the suffragette.

PAUL RAINEY PICTURES FOR STATE RIGHTS.

Following the usual custom of very large features, the Paul J. Rainey African Hunt pictures, after having played to tremendous profits at first-class theater prices in the larger cities, it is now to be put out on the State right basis, to be shown at popular prices in straight motion picture houses. If ever a film has demonstrated its drawing and entertaining power, that picture must surely be the Paul Rainey Hunt. For six months it drew large crowds at the Lyceum Theater, New York, in the hottest kind of weather and for once, at least, society people were heard to rave over a motion picture. This test of its popularity was duplicated in most of the large American cities, so that little remains to be said of its efficiency as a money-getting picture.

While this subject has already played to more than a million dollars, only those who could afford to pay dollar prices have had an opportunity to see it, which leaves the field practically clear to those exhibitors who cater to that great mass of American people who support the lower priced houses. What might be lost on account of those who have already seen the picture is more than offset by the unlimited praise that it received from the press, clergy, schools, natural history societies, and all others who have seen it. The picture has already been well advertised and has shown what it will draw; therefore it should prove to be a great drawing card as a State right feature. It is not improbable that those who have seen it before would be pleased to see it once more when it comes around at popular prices. The entire film has been re-titled so as to render the services of a lecturer unnecessary. The picture is being sold by the Jungle Film Company, of 1600 Broadway, New York.

"THE DRESS OF LOLITA" (Reliance).

The romantic atmosphere which so readily lends itself to the emotional children of sunny Italy, is the dominant feature of "The Dress of Lolita," a strong drama almost bordering on tragedy from the talented pen of Mary Murillo.

A young Italian couple, by way of Ellis Island, are plunged into the great melting pot—America—with visions of the prosperity and happiness that is soon to be theirs. They are swallowed up in one of the many Little Italys located in New York City and the desperate struggle for a bare living begins.

Scene from "The Dress of Lolita" (Reliance).

Unknown to her devoted husband, Lolita, the bride wife, sells her wedding gown which he sees at a distance being worn by its new owner, who is flirting with a young Italian of the colony. Thinking that his wife is unfaithful to him, his state of mind leads him to commit acts of violence that cause tense situations and highly emotional scenes to follow each other in quick succession to the great moment of the drama—a really brilliant climax.

The characters portrayed call for exceptionally clever acting and are ably handled by Irene Hunt, May Willard, Charles Perley, and a strong supporting company—released November 5th.

CHANGES IN PERSONNEL OF UNIVERSAL COAST COMPANIES.

With an eye to strengthening the West Coast companies, the Universal Film Manufacturing Company has made several changes and realignments of its playing and directing forces at the Hollywood, Cal., studios. Edna Maison, who has been playing leads in the Monday Powers company, has been advanced to the feminine lead in the Thursday Rex, playing opposite Bob Leonard and under the direction of Otis Turner.

Allan Dwan has returned to the Universal fold, bringing with him Pauline Bush, M. J. MacQuarrie and other members of his company. He will assemble an extra company for large productions. James Neil will be attached to this company as leading man. The latter's position as director with the Wednesday "Joker" will be filled by Allan Curtis, who will continue to direct the Saturday "Joker" also.

Donald Macdonald, who has been leading man with the Friday Nestor under A. E. Christie, will direct the Monday Powers. In his company will be found Howard Hichman, Laura Oakley, Marie Walcamp, and Dick Rosson. Mr. Macdonald will be succeeded as leading man of the Nestor company by John A. Sterling, who has been playing comedy roles for the past two years with the Essanay company.

REGARDING HELEN GARDNER PLAYERS.

The Helen Gardner Picture Players have made a contract to produce twelve three thousand-foot pictures for The Helgar Corporation. These pictures, we understand, will be released through the Warner's Feature Film Service. The first picture will be entitled "A Daughter of Pan," to be followed by another picture of modern Russian life and conditions.

This contract on the part of The Helgar Corporation does not mean that these players will devote all of their time to this work. On the contrary, during the year, four, six to eight-reel pictures will be made of big, massive subjects.

MISS JEANETTE A. COHEN—POSTER SALESWOMAN.

In these days of the militant suffragette we are prepared for almost anything in the way of womanly activity. It is not surprising then when we find an energetic, ambitious young woman making good as a seller of posters. Why not? When a woman will to do a thing she usually succeeds. That is why Miss Jeanette A. Cohen has made a place for herself in the sales department of the poster business. It was only about six months ago that this young woman decided that she could sell posters to the motion picture makers and she imparted that decision to the H. C. Miner Litho Co., of New York. The Miner folks took her at her word and permitted her to create a M. P. department which she conducted to the satisfaction of all concerned. But, evidently, the connection was not altogether to Miss Cohen's satisfaction, for she sought what she believed to be a better opportunity with the Metro Litho Co., which concern enabled her to extend her work to the theatrical field as well as that of the motion picture.

Miss Jeanette A. Cohen.

Miss Cohen says her success is due to her endeavor to serve her patrons faithfully and to build up a patronage by service and quality. She is the only woman in America that we have heard of who is following this particular calling. Among the trade she has made many friends by her straightforward business way and has proved again that woman can do things in fields that have been usurped by mere man.

KLEINE-CINES AIRSHIP BLOWS UP IN MID-AIR.

Surely "Eclipse" has "eclipsed" itself in matter of pictures where the absolute dare-deviltry of the actor provides a thrill for the picture fan. The above illustration shows the smashup of a Bleriot monoplane, which, with Joe Hamman and his wife, is plainly seen to blow up in a great burst of smoke and flame and drop to the earth in full view of the camera. This scene is from a thrilling Kleine-Eclipse entitled: "Airship versus Aeroplane," a release date for which has not yet been set.

SQUEEZED WOMAN'S HAND; GETS THIRTY DAYS.

According to the Philadelphia Telegraph, Harry Steinberg has been sent to the County Prison for thirty days for persisting in squeezing the hand of a woman patron in a picture show. It just happened that sitting behind the woman being annoyed was her husband, who had been unable to get a seat beside her when the two entered the house. The magistrate who heard the case intimated that, had he been in the position of the husband, he would not have been very easy on the culprit.

KINEMACOLOR AT MEDICAL MEETING.

At a special meeting of the Homeopathic Medical Society of New York State, held at Syracuse, N. Y., Dr. Sprague Carlton, of New York City, delivered a very interesting address on eugenics, illustrated by the natural color motion pictures made by the Kinemacolor process. This is the first time in this country that a medical lecture of this sort has been illustrated in this manner.

The Kinemacolor pictures as presented in Syracuse were the result of nearly two years of research, and the series covered the entire range of the subject. At the present time, when press, pulpit and public are taking up the matter of eugenics, proper sanitation and medical treatment, it is interesting to note that the formerly despised "movies" give every promise of being a big factor in enlightening the present generation on matters that have formerly been kept as a mystery and dark secret.

Mr. Carlton, in the course of his remarks, said: "I thoroughly believe that the use of natural color motion pictures will revolutionize the teaching methods in colleges, medical schools and clinics as it is possible by these pictures to show the technique, not only to the members of the clinic, but also to the surgeon himself, demonstrating the faults that may have developed in his technique. As the pictures can be repeated as many times as required, the absolute reproduction of operations and treatments of all descriptions can be most vividly shown."

At the present time the Kinemacolor Company of America has formulated and is putting into effect plans for establishing educational pictures in public schools, colleges and associations of different kinds.

FURTHER ENLARGEMENTS OF WORLD SPECIAL.

The World Special Films Corporation is still expanding, branch offices having been opened in Chicago, Cincinnati, Atlanta, and Kansas City. For the Chicago office F. H. McMillan, formerly of the M. & F. Feature, has been engaged as manager. In Cincinnati, G. J. Trask, well known in that city through his connections with the Mutual. In Kansas City, S. J. Berman, also an Ex-Mutual man. For Atlanta, C. G. Bailey, formerly connected with the Kinetograph and the General Film Co. The extensive alterations are being made in all of these offices, and they will be ready for business by the time this item appears in print. Phil. Gleichman, general manager of the corporation, left recently for St. Louis, Dallas and New Orleans to open branch offices for the concern in those towns.

CHURCH TO BE CONVERTED INTO THEATER.

The Church structure in De Kalb Avenue, Brooklyn, abandoned two years ago by the Epworth M. E. Congregation because of the construction of a theater near it, is to be converted into a 600-seat picture theater. The cost of the alterations will be $10,000.

MISPLACED CREDIT.

An apology is due the "Bioscope," a very excellent British motion picture trade journal, in regard to a cartoon that was reproduced in the October 11th issue of this paper and credited to the wrong source. The cartoon was of W. N. Selig, drawn by "Peter." The caption line stated that it was from the K. & L. weekly, whereas the Bioscope should have received the credit.

NEW AGENCIES.

Mr. W. H. Scofield, formerly of the Ambrosio Company, is still in Europe where he has secured the agency for the products of the Gloria and Leonardi Film Companies. He will be back in this country in a few days.

State Right Purchases

NOTE—Exhibitors are requested to keep this list on file or copy from it the names of purchasers in their particular territories. These lists will not be republished and we cannot undertake to furnish back information by mail to those who have neglected to keep a record.

LAEMMLE MAKES CORRECTION.

I wish to call your attention to a mis-statement of facts contained in your issue of November 3rd, on page 480, in which you say:

> "At a meeting held recently, officers and directors were elected for the Universal Film Exchanges with offices at 1600 Broadway and Fourteenth Street, New York, to serve the ensuing year. Carl Laemmle was elected president; David Horsley, vice-president, and Mark M. Dintenfass, secretary and treasurer, by the newly elected directors composed of Carl Laemmle, Mark M. Dintenfass, David Horsley, P. A. Powers, and William H. Swanson."

The error consisted in the fact that the stockholders of the exchanges are as stated: Carl Laemmle, Mark M. Dintenfass, David Horsley, P. A. Powers and William H. Swanson; these in turn elected, Mark M. Dintenfass, David Horsley, and myself as directors, and the directors then elected officers as per the above.

Yours very truly,
CARL LAEMMLE.

McINTYRE & RICHTER DISSOLVE.

William Kessel has been appointed receiver for the purpose of winding up the business of McIntyre & Richter, feature film dealers, of 23 East 14th Street, New York. The firm will be reorganized and will continue without interruption under another name. There are no liabilities and one or the other of the partners will carry on the business when matters are adjusted. Meanwhile all bookings will be taken care of under the supervision of the receiver.

Notes of the Trade.

WM. CHASE TEMPLE, organizer of the Florida Citrus Exchange, and well known as a Pittsburgh steel magnate, has tendered an invitation to John Bunny, of the Vitagraph Company, to go to Florida this winter with a company of players and be his guest at his beautiful state at Winter Park, where every facility to enact picture plays will be given him.

The executive heads of the Ramo Films, Inc., are busy working out elaborate plans for their new studio and factory combined, which will be ready for occupancy the early part of this coming year. New life has been put into the organization through the collaboration of Mr. Homer H. Snow, its president.

The World Special Films Corp. have just bought the splendid Eclair film, "Protea," and will have it ready for the exhibitor about November 1st. This is one of the most remarkable films ever brought out, and as the press agent says, "A mile of film with a thrill in every foot."

Two scenarios accepted by the Reliance for early release are by actresses of the company, and in both cases the authoress has been cast for the leading role. Carey Lee is responsible for the photoplay, "For Love of a Man; or, The Woman Who Began Again," and Irene Hunt will be seen in her own drama entitled, "The Other Woman."

"Blood Brotherhood" is the title of Phillips Smalley and Lois Weber's latest Universal play now under preparation. This is the play incorporating scenes of an actual run on a bank, taken some time ago in Los Angeles by Mr. Smalley. It is a vigorous, human-interest play with an excellent climax.

The National Board of Censorship, in their report on George Kleine's "Last Days of Pompeii," give it the highest rating possible. Lest their printed form should fail of its purpose in this case, the National Board wrote across the bottom: "Beautiful, wonderful, very fine."

Moe Streimer, of the Theatre Film Company, New York, is in Northern New York exploiting "Arizona," the New York State rights for this being controlled by his firm.

A new building, specially constructed, will house the executive offices at the Thanhouser plant from about next week on. These offices have hitherto been located in the factory end of the New Rochelle establishment, facing Main Street. The new executive offices building is on the side street to the left of the factory. The old quarters will be taken over by the factory workers, who will use them as joining rooms. The new office structure is of stone, and contains private offices for Mr. Hite, Mr. Lonergan and Mr. Adler, and special rooms for the bookkeepers and stenographers. Uniformed attendants will be stationed "on the gate."

E. Mandelbaum, president of the World Special Films Corporation, returned from Cleveland recently reporting big business on "Les Miserables" and "The Betrothal," which they control for Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky. At the Knickerbocker Theater in Cleveland, "Les Miserables" played to close to $3,500 on the week.

"Arizona Bill" is a very well known Eclipse actor on this side of the Atlantic and has always been noted for the daring work he successfully performs in pictures. In spite of this the employees of George Kleine's Chicago organization are kept constantly wondering when news will reach them of the violent death of the interpid actor.

Joe Welch, whose Hebrew impersonations have been delighting vaudeville audiences for years, will appear shortly in a three-part Warner's Feature entitled "The Struggle for Wealth." It depicts Joe in the role of a poor emigrant starting out in New York to make his way and fighting against numerous obstacles to attain a position among his fellow men.

An unique entertainment was given at the Kinemacolor Little Theater in the Mecca Building, 1600 Broadway one evening recently. The audience comprised leading literary lights, magazine writers, artists and stage stars Miss Ruth St. Denis was the guest of honor. New dramatic and comedy subjects were shown; also the new Poiret fashions and pictures of leading theatrical stars, which included Raymond Hitchcock and Flora Zabelle, Lillian Russell, Anna Held and others as well known.

Robert Leonard is engaged upon an especially fine Universal drama, at Los Angeles, entitled "By Fate's Decree." The story centers around an ex-convict, played by Mr. Leonard, who is regenerated in a remarkable way. Others doing good work in the cast are Joe Singleton, Helen Case and Little Doris Baker.

Mr. William H. Burton, playing the part of "Caesar," the negro, in Pilot's four-part production of Oliver Byron's great play, is the original Caesar of "Across the Continent." He appeared in his original role of Caesar forty-seven years ago.

Owing to the severe illness of Clifford Bruce, Director Oscar Eagle has been forced to discontinue work on a number of important scenes on the Selig production of "The Royal Box." On account of the same reason work has been delayed on a great detective play, "The Circular Staircase."

Miss Winifred Greenwood will star in a two-part production by Tom Ricketts under title, "When the Road Forks," scheduled for release December 15th, 1913.

Bert Diener, late of the Mutual Films Corporation, Buffalo, has been engaged by the World Special Films Corporation as general manager of their Buffalo branch, with H. G. Segal as assistant manager. Phil Gleichman has engaged J. G. Conner as manager for the St. Louis branch of the corporation, located at 804 Pine Street.

* * *

Mr. Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players Film Company, who has recently returned from a tour of Europe in the interests of his company, found a flattering respect for the Famous Players' productions, and he is confident that in the hands of Mr. Baber, the European distribution of the "30 Famous Features a Year" will establish new records.

Cleveland's newest and most beautiful playhouse, the Miles Theater, which cost $500,000 to build, has contracted with H. Charnas, manager of the Cleveland office of Warner's Features, Inc., for the exclusive program of Warner's Features.

King Baggot, Universal director, leading man, president of the Screen Club, etc., has just completed one of his favorite character studies. He played the part of a lovable, tender "wop," which he made famous in "Tony and the Stork." "The Return of Tony" is the title of the new picture, which promises a rich treat.

William D. Taylor, the newly engaged leading man of the Vitagraph Western, is an actor of wide experience and of ever growing favor in the film world. An artist, clever and versatile, he has proved himself a valuable addition to a stock company, whose demands necessitate a wide variety of talents from its members. Mr. Taylor, besides acting opposite Miss Anne Schaefer in Western dramas, will be cast for the leads in the Indian romances, the society and domestic plays and high comedies that the Vitagraph Western will essay to picture.

Simplex

Quality stands the test of service

Read the unsolicited opinions of "reel" live wires:-

Precision Machine Co., Salvin Rock, West Haven, Conn.
New York.

Gentlemen:—I have used the Simplex machine for several months, and would say that it is, in my opinion, the best and most satisfactory machine I have ever used.

Have had sixteen years' steady experience as a moving picture operator, and during that time have used many good machines, but I consider the "Simplex" the best and easiest running of them all.

(Signed) J. P. DIBBLE.

603 Carolina Ave., S. E., Washington, D. C., Feb. 24, 1913.

To the Manufacturers of Simplex Machine.

Dear Sirs:—I believe in the "Simplex." I am a machinist of twenty-two years' experience and have been operating five years, using all kinds of machines, and I think I know a good one when I see it.

(Signed) W. H. MARSHALL,
Chief Operator, Avenue Grand Theatre.

Precision Machine Co., San Bernardino, Cal., Oct. 16/13.
317 East 34th St., New York City.

Gentlemen:—Received the Simplex machine, and I am well pleased with it.

If anyone that lives in this locality inquires about a machine, tell them to go and look at the Temple Theatre in San Bernardino, and if they don't buy a Simplex, they don't want a machine at all. I am showing a better picture than any I have seen in California. The patrons claim there is none like it in Los Angeles or San Diego, so clear and steady.

Wishing you continued success for your most excellent machine, I remain,

Yours very truly,
(Signed) GUY SLIPPER,
Temple Theatre.

Such convincing proof of Simplex superiority is of tremendous value to the prospective buyer, especially when backed by the Precision guarantee of accuracy of workmanship, high-grade materials and that exclusive quality of projection.

CORRESPONDENCE

NEW ENGLAND AND CANADA.

ON September 30, the license recently granted to a moving picture concern at Needham, Mass., for exhibitions in "The Old Car Barn," was suspended by the selectmen on account of the opposition that developed among Needham citizens, as shown at a recent public meeting. The question of a license for moving picture theaters in Needham will probably be settled at the town meeting, to be held soon. Zealous, but entirely misguided efforts on the part of the clergy are responsible for this absurd agitation against the license.

The first big meeting of the Harvard freshmen class was held this week at Harvard Union, Cambridge, Mass. Motion pictures was the program for the class of 1917, at its first class function, a smoker.

The hearing on the petition of the pastors of five churches and one hundred and fifty citizens of Chohasset, Mass., against allowing the Town Hall to be used for moving picture shows was granted on September 29 by the selectmen. The worthy petitioners do not object to all moving pictures. But they want a higher grade and more educational subjects than those ran by the present exhibitor. Mr. Frank Mead has been operating the Town Hall as a photoplay theater for some time, and to excellent trade, too. At the hearing the objections were made by the following: Rev. Howard K. Barton, of St. Stephen's Episcopal Church; Rev. Frank B. McAllister, of the Second Parish Church; Dr. Bristol, representing the Parent Teacher Association, and George M. Enner. Inasmuch as the selectmen knew, as do many others, that the programs at the Town Hall are of excellent moral tone, these gentlemen merely placed the matter under advisement, to report later.

The Boston Globe, in its feature editorial of October 2, signed by the well known "Uncle Dudley," scores heavily the obscene plays now being so often produced on the legitimate stage. After a very much deserved "knock," Uncle Dudley turns to motion pictures, remarking thusly: "The moving picture theaters have a National Board of Censorship which has done good work in keeping the obscene from the films, but the quantity of crime films which the board has allowed to be flashed before the pliable minds of children is still too large. The board's control, however, is better than scattered police supervision.

"The power of censorship over the stage ought not to be in a thousand bureaucratic hands in a thousand cities, where personal prejudice and narrowness, playing to the gallery and vote-getting righteousness are possible and powerful influences.

"A National Board of Censorship for the drama, composed of men and women broad in education and character, but right minded to the core, would be far more able to pick the wheat from the chaff. Intellect, guided by morality, is the only sane ground for censorship. Uncle Dudley."

The Feature Film Company, of Canada, with offices at 205 St. Catherine St., West Montreal, has purchased "Arizona" from the All Star Feature Corporation, 220 West 42nd Street, New York, and is now booking this feature picture in Canada.

Joseph Christiano, 21 Lee Grand Avenue, of Greenwich, Conn., is now having plans made for a one-story moving picture theater, on a plot of land measuring 41 by 85 feet.

N. N. Brooks, of the Automatic Vaudeville Company, N. Y., has transferred Manager C. B. Thompson from the Premier to the South End Theater Boston, where he will act in a similar capacity. James T. Allen, formerly assistant to Mr. Thompson, is now installed as manager of the Premier.

Manager J. A. Eslow, of the New England Universal Film Exchange, Boston, comes to the front with the statement that his concern has secured the only pictures to be taken of the World's Series Baseball games. Mr. Eslow has decided to purchase prints, and is already making advance bookings.

It is rumored that Fred B. Murphy, formerly assistant manager of the Waterville office of the Mutual Film Corporation, and now in charge of this concern's Springfield, Mass., branch, is to journey to New Orleans, there to care for the Mutual's Southern business.

Manager W. O. Gould, of the Pastime Theater, at Brunswick, Me., states that his programs of photoplays only are drawing unusually good trade.

Henry E. Dixey, in the feature picture "Chelsea 7750," drew splendid houses for Manager Joseph A. McConville, of the New Portland Theater, Portland, Me.

Hiram Abrams, of Portland, Me., opened his new Opera House, Bath, Me., on October 11. Feature pictures is to be the policy of this house.

Benjamin Blick is now installed as assistant manager of the Fox Theater, at Waterbury, Conn., where he ably helps Manager Henry C. Fitzgerald care for the theater. Ernest Cohen has been switched to the William Fox house at New Britain, Conn., as assistant manager.

Sam Rosen opened his Globe Theater, Waterbury, Conn., on Saturday, October 4, to a "S. R. O." house. The Globe has a central location in West Main street, and has a seating capacity of 600. The house is first-class, and fireproof in every way. Vaudeville and pictures make up the program.

Louis M. Boas is no longer resident manager of the Savoy Theater, Fall River, Mass.

"In the Bishop's Carriage," with Mary Pickford, pulled very big business for Manager E. L. Knight at his Bijou Theater, Springfield, Mass., on October 1.

The Imperial Theater, the new Keith Theater at St, John, Canada, was formally opened on September 19. The proceeds of the opening show were equally distributed between the Catholic and Protestant Orphan Homes, and amounted to nearly $1,500. Mayor Frink and Lieut. Gov. Wood were especially invited guests, and both men addressed the large audience. The Imperial seats 1,800, and moving pictures and singing and musical acts make up the programs. Admission price is ten cents to all parts of the house, children five cents at matinees. Box seats, twenty-five cents. The house is by far the finest in St. John, and should "clean up."

The Victoria Theater, at Lawrence, Mass., formerly owned by A. A. Kellman, has been purchased by a company, headed by Hiram Abrams, known as the Victoria Amusement Company. Motion pictures will continue to be the policy. F. S. Eager, of New York, has been secured as manager, and he comes with a good record behind him. "In the Bishop's Carriage" was the first feature under the new management.

The Broadway Theater, Haverhill, Mass., has a new manager in the person of P. W. Maguire, who succeeds J. Fred Lovett, who is now with the Academy of Music at Haverhill, Mass. Mr. Maguire will continue the same general ideas that were put into operation so successfully by Mr. Lovett, and pictures will continue as the policy. The Employees of the Broadway Theater, in appreciation of Mr. Lovett's square treatment of them, presented the latter with a very fine traveling bag.

The Selectmen of Milford, Mass., were evidently willing to issue Sunday licenses to the theaters of Milford, but as soon as the clergy heard that this privilege was about to be granted, they raised a howl of protest that could be heard for miles around. Not wishing to antagonize the church, the Selectmen decided to refuse the licenses, to the disgust of the managers and public.

Manager A. R. London, of the Grand Theater, Hamilton, Canada, offers Edison's Talking Pictures now and then, as usually the Grand plays road shows.

Surveys and measurements have been taken by architects for the new theater to be built at London, Conn., by John Griffin. It is now expected that the actual work will soon be under way.

The Nickel Theater, St. John, Can., has closed, so as not to oppose the new Imperial Theater. Both are owned by the Keith interests. It is believed that the Nickel will be closed for the next two and one-half years, when the present lease expires.

Among this week's incorporations are: Medford Amusement Company, Medford, Mass.; incorporators: Eben O. Ramsdell, George A. Ramsdell, A. Judson Ramsdell. Authorized capital, $5,000.

The Orpheum Theater Company, of Malden, Mass., was incorporated this week by Eben. O. Ramsdell and George E. Ramsdell. This is a $50,000 concern.

The Hesse Motion Picture Machine Company, of Boston, is a new corporation, with the promoters named as J. Joseph Hesse, Albin Peterson and Edwin F. Porter. $50,000 is the amount of the incorporation.

The Victoria Theater Company, Boston, was formed this week as a $4,000 concern, with Hiram Abrams, "Cy" H. Bunce, W. E. Greene, and Joseph M. Levenson, as the promoters.

On Sunday, October 12, at Manchester, N. H., was held the New England convention of the Theatrical Employes and Moving Picture Operators' Unions.

From time to time the Moving Picture World has warned the readers to beware of fake operating schools, that promise a license, and a good position in return for a fee, but there are evidently many still suffering from their acquaintanceship with schools (?) of this kind. The following advertisement in the Boston Post this week, tells its own story of the fleeced victims: "Wanted—Men Who Have Been Buncoed by Fake Moving Picture Operating Schools. Call or Write. T. C. Barrows, Operators' Union, 113½ Eliot Street, Boston, Wednesday, Between 9 and 1." The World man called on Business Agent W. [illegible]. Franke, of the Boston Local 182, of the Operators' Union, in regard to the matter. Mr. Franke states the game is worked about as follows in Boston, and the writer's personal investigations strongly confirm his remarks: "The schools responsible for the trouble in the Hub are almost continually inserting classified advertisements under the Help Wanted section, which run about like this: 'Operators wanted at once, good pay, steady work, apply, etc.' When the applicants appear they are usually persuaded to sign a contract at about $25, or as much of that amount as the victim can be separated from. For this fee, they are to be taught the operating trade, to receive a license, and to be placed in a steady position. The contract has a very nice little Joker in it, however, to the effect that if the student fails to keep any appointment for his lesson, the contract is null and void. The offices of these worthy schools have a way of opening and closing at various times. After a student appears for his lesson, only to find the office closed, he waits around a while, then goes off. The next day he is informed that his contract is broken, as he should have waited about until the office opened again. Now and then, the student completes his course, gets his license, and then the school can't find him his 'good pay and steady work.' It is stated that one of the concerns owns a theater at New Bedford, Mass., to which it sends a student who becomes insistent. He is kept here a few days, only to be discharged for incompetency. At any rate, the advertisements are misleading, as these people have no need for '2 men quick,' as they have hundreds on their waiting lists." On September 20, Business Agent Franke submitted a resolution to the Boston Central Labor Union, asking that this body ask the press to refuse to publish these fraudulent advertisements. Mr. Franke also tells the World man that Chief of Police Whitney, in whose department moving picture licenses are granted, has been appealed to. Mr. Whitney stated that he was aware of the schemes, but is powerless to act. Headquarters of the Boston local is visited each day by men who are victims of these misleading advertisements, and who have spent their last dollar with visions of a job before them. A great many times the money being borrowed. "In several instances," remarks Mr. Franke, "men have turned over to these sharks their watches and jewelry belonging to their families, expecting to be put to work, and then find they have been buncoed by a gang of swindlers who are daily expanding their operations, much to the detriment of the regular operators." These columns recently told of the arrest of one of the swindlers on complaint of two men, but he was released by the police later, as the victims refused to testify in court. These so-called schools prey mostly on ignorant country boys, coming to Boston from all New England. Incidentally, it may be added, that Local 182 is prepared to spend its last cent to break the backs of these schools.

"Les Miserables" entered upon its sixth week of prosperity at Tremont Temple, Boston. Tuesday, October 14, has been made "Victor Hugo Night." This feature photoplay has been playing to packed houses, with two performances daily. Friday night performances are to be omitted from now on, due to previous bookings.

The suburbs of Boston seem dead set against the granting of licenses for Sunday night exhibitions of motion pictures, although persistent efforts have been made by these exhibitors to change this attitude. The great talking point of these theaters seems to lie in the fact that, inasmuch as the theaters of Boston proper secure these Sunday licenses, it is unfair to discriminate against suburban theaters in this respect. The out-of-town exhibitors state, and with correctness, that they offer only strictly moral pictures, exhibited in clean, decent theaters, and that the public wants Sunday shows. As the matter now stands, citizens of the suburbs journey to Boston to satisfy their moving picture hunger on Sunday nights. It is the clergy who have "killed" the Sunday license, probably because the shows would draw their patronage away from the services. There is now a movement on foot to secure the co-operation of the clergy in this matter, by asking them to help select the pictures to be used on Sundays. It is hoped that the clergy will change its hostile attitude, if given a voice in the selection of the programs.

On Thursday, September 25, the moving picture house proprietors had their "turn" before Mayor J. F. Fitzgerald, of Boston. They received a lecture similar to that given to the "legitimate" theater managers a week ago. Sixty or more exhibitors and representatives from the various film exchanges, were present in the Aldermanic Chamber. The mayor told the exhibitors that, to the best of his knowledge, the local photoplay theaters were being conducted along reasonably satisfactory lines. He wished, however, to warn exhibitors that the instructions of Building Commissioner Everett against blocking of exits and entrances by large frames containing photographs and lithographs, must be absolutely lived up to. Many of the exhibitors have complied with this order, but others have disregarded it, and the mayor stated that he would not warn anyone again. The mayor remarked that there was no excuse to disobey, as each house had received the instructions written by Mr. Everett. The mayor declared that all such frames and advertising boards should be suspended from the walls at entrances, and that there should be immediate reform in the practice of advertising films by posters and banners depicting crimes, such as shooting, battles between persons, and the using of knives, daggers and revolvers, and the choking and strangling of men and women. The mayor said that, as a rule, these posters and banners do not present an actual part of the picture shown on the screen, but are the product of the imagination of the designer. (Every Boston exhibitor knows that the abuses the mayor mentioned are really only in practice by three or four houses, and it seems too bad that the great majority of houses, which keep their lobbies free from such sensational "dope" should be made to suffer because of these few houses that insist on a curcus-like front ) The mayor stated it was sufficiently well known as an order from his office that Boston photoplay houses should refrain from handling films pertaining to sensational happenings in the news of the world, such as the Thaw and Schmidt affairs. In conclusion the mayor said he expected the exhibitors to keep the moral tone of their shows high, and that they would be critically watched by his office.

The celebration of the fourth anniversary of the Orpheum Theater, Boston, as a motion picture and vaudeville house this week, brings into prominence the name of Marcus Loew, who, four years ago, secured the theater from William Morris. The Orpheum was the first theater owned by Mr. Loew in New England, and the first one he secured outside of New York, where he started his chain of theaters. Since then Mr. Loew has acquired the St. James and South End theaters, Boston, houses in Fall River and other cities. The Orpheum has been a big success since the day it opened under its present banner, and the St. James, a failure in the hands of others, is getting to be a big winner. No small amount of praise is due to Mr. Victor Morris, Mr. Loew's chief aid in Boston, who has demonstrated his unquestioned ability as a theatrical manager. Mr. Bernard Frank, of the St. James, is also helping the Loew banner in Boston by his efforts at this house

The Mutual Film Corporation's Boston offices, in charge of W. H. Bradley, continues its prosperous career, and always seems able to "take on" a few more New England photoplay houses.

The Charleston, Mass., Navy Yard is being entertained with moving picture programs from the Mutual's Boston offices. These shows are very popular with the sailors.

Manager J. A. Eslow, of the New England Universal Film Exchange, reports that he has signed with the Pastime Theater, Fall River, Mass., for exclusive Universal service.

Manager Arthur Allen, of the Palace Theater, Bangor, Me., reports that his new Palace, of the same city, is now nearly completed. The new Palace seats 1,400, and is a beautiful theater in every way, being modern and fireproof. Universal films are scheduled for this house, and Mr. Allen will also use this same grade of pictures in his old Palace, which is to continue.

Mr. N. J. Karum has finally decided to show Universal pictures in his new house at Pittsfield, Me. Other reports have been circulated, but this is the correct "dope."

The Universal Film Exchange's Boston offices, through its manager, Mr. J. A. Eslow, reports a shipment of films to Cuba, for the military fort there. Mr. Eslow has also sold his service to the Santo Domingo Amusement Company, West Indies Islands, which has built a large theater in Santo Domingo city. Full equipment, including two Power's machines, were also bought from Mr. Eslow. The admission price is fifty cents at this house, and on special occasions, sixty-three cents.

George S. Beach, of the Royal Theater, Edmonton, Canada, reports excellent trade with picture programs.

"The War Correspondents," a four-reel Itala subject, has been purchased by the Famous Players Film Company, for New England territory.

G. H. Callahan, of the American Theater Curtain and Supply Company, states that the Star and Alhambra Theaters, Waterbury, Conn., have purchased Radium Gold Fibre Screens, which are pleasing the owners of these houses.

There has been considerable trouble between the moving picture theaters of Holyoke, Mass., and their operators, and, for a while, it looked as though a strike would result. However, the differences have been adjusted. It is understood that the operators have asked an increase in wages of from $18 to $20 a week, and from $5 to $6 on Sundays, to which the exhibitors have agreed. The international president, Charles C. Shay, was in Holyoke, and helped this peaceful settlement along.

Nicholas Abadallah is about to build a combination dance hall and moving picture theater at Norwood, Mass., and plans for it are now being made.

Dr. Meyers, of Tremont Temple, Boston, a preacher of much reputation, extending from coast to coast, was present at an exhibition of "Les Miserables" at Tremont Temple last week. This feature picture made a very favorable impression on Dr. Meyers, who used the reels as the basis of a twelve-minute talk in his sermon. He remarked on the intellectual and educational advantages of this production, gave it his warm personal endorsement, advising and urging everyone to see it for himself.

The New England Amusement Company, of Providence, R. I., went down to Georgetown, Del., to fix up its incorporation. It is a concern with a capital stock of $75,000, with James W. Lees, William A. Lees, and John Williams, all of Providence, as the promoters.

Foundations have been started for the new S. Z. Poli Theater, at Main and Gold streets, Hartford, Conn. The land measures 130 by 70 feet. The house will contain 1,200 orchestra seats, 1,200 in the two balconies, and fifty-two box seats, giving a total seating capacity of almost 2,500. The house will cost close to $300,000, and will be up to the Poli standard in every way. Work will be rushed along, and the house should be ready by January, 1914. The architects are Brown & Von Beren, and the property is owned by Pasquale M. D'Esopo. Vaudeville and pictures are to form the policy of this house.

The new Washington Theater, Washington and Kneeland streets, Boston, has reopened, after extensive alterations. Business is fair, with vaudeville and picture programs.

Mr. Mitchell Mark, who opened the first real photoplay theater in Boston, but now operating in New York and Buffalo, is looking over the New England territory, as head of the M. H. Mark Realty Corporation. It is stated that Mr. Mark has any amount of money behind him to buy or lease theaters in this section. Mr. "Moe" Mark, a brother, and owner of the Comique Theater, Lynn, Mass., is ill with throat trouble.

Hiram Abrams, of Portland, Me., opened his new Opera House, Bath, Me., on Saturday, October 11. The house is first class, and will show feature pictures and vaudeville.

The New Theater, now in course of construction at Brantford, Can., will not be ready for its opening before next December, owing to some labor troubles.

F. F. Egener, manager of the White Star Theater, Woodstock, Can., is doing very well with his programs of pictures. His opposition is the Griffin Theater, playing pictures and vaudeville, as well as road shows.

Manager Ray S. Averill, manager of the Poli Theater, at Waterbury, Conn., has instituted "Parcel Post" night to help out his vaudeville and picture program. It's the old scheme of country store, something for nothing, but seems to be doing well in its new guise.

The many friends of Mr. Ben Jackson, manager of William Fox's Grand Theater, New Haven, Conn., will be glad to know that he has recovered from his severe operation, left the hospital, and is again on the job.

The Princess Theater, formerly the Edisonia Theater, of Springfield, Mass., opened to good business on September 20. Mr. A. Mandelberg, of New York, is in charge, and he has decided to feature the Famous Players' product.

"One Hundred Years of Mormonism" was booked for the Gilmore Theater, Springfield, Mass., this week, but the feature was finally cancelled.

Riverside Park, near Springfield, has closed its season, which was a prosperous one. Manager W. S. Wallace, of the Park, was presented with a traveling set at an informal dinner party given in his honor by the employees.

C. B. Rhea, manager of the Opera House, Westfield, Mass., resigned on September 20. The owners, the Goldstein Brothers Amusement Company, have placed William O'Brien, of their New York office, in charge.

Waldo Holmes, formerly connected with the Broadway Theater, Springfield, is now associated with the Plaza Theater, of that city.

Proprietor Wesley, of the Wesley Theater, at Greenfield, Mass., has leased the house to Mr. C. B. Crockett, who will continue the theater as a vaudeville and picture house.

Manager C. W. Currier, of the Opera House, Milford, Mass., has petitioned the Board of Selectmen for a Sunday license. It is extremely doubtful if the request will be granted, as several moving picture houses have already been turned down.

On Tuesday afternoon, October 7, there gathered at the headquarters of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Massachusetts, 25 Legrange street, Boston, several officials of the organization and exhibitors, who talked over matters of prime importance to the best interests of Massachusetts exhibitors. This body of men is strongly in favor of the abolishment of the present obnoxious "five-minute law," which forbids the exhibition of photoplays for a longer time than twenty minutes, withuot five minutes of some other form of entertainment, and second, is to do its utmost to secure licenses for Sunday night concerts in Massachusetts cities at present forbidding them, due to opposition of the local authorities or clergy. At six o'clock the same day, about thirty odd exhibitors sat down to a very fine dinner in a private room at the Hotel Dreyfus, and a well prepared feast. Speech-making was then in order, and President Ernest H. Horstman made one of his short, but pithy addresses, and then called on Vice-President Harry I. Wasserman, who made the most pertinent and plain speech of the evening, outlining things just as they are. Others who spoke were: Mr. Joseph Mack, former president of the League; J. A. Elsow, manager New England Universal Film Exchange; R. O. Marson, R. D. Marson Moving Picture Company; G. I. Appleby, assistant manager Mutual Film Corporation of Mass.; Harry Asher, manager Famous Players' Film Company of New England; E. J. Farrell, General Film; Herman Rifkin, Eastern Feature Film Company, and Manager Jacob Lourie, of the Beacon Theater Company. Others present were: Charlie Stern, World Special Film Corporation; Harry F. Campbell, of the firm of Grant & Campbell, and also New England manager of Warner's Features, Inc.: J. S. Kittredge, Theater Voyons, Lowell; J. P. Butler, of the American Seating Company; H. A. Sivovlos, secretary of the League; John Patten, Bates Opera House, Attleboro; W. P. Allen and F. H. Vine, both of the General Film; W. P. Sprout, Union Theater, Charlestown; Sam Hause, Universal; J. G. Cahill (McCue & Cahill), Brockton; W. E. Dowlin, Magic Theater, East Boston; Toomey & Demara, Lawrence; S. V. Grand, Novelty Feature Films, Boston; F. J. McAlbon, of Donovan & Walker, Taunton. Manager Berman, of the Empire, Winthrop, and many others. After the banquet, the boys ambled down to the Casino Theater, to enjoy a little burlesque, by way of a change. After the show, the "old guard," the "regular" fellows—biked to the Café Hayward, arriving in ample time to order refreshments. In this special party were: Harry Asher, Harry Campbell, Sam Grand, W. P. Allen, Manager Lydon, J. S. Kittredge, F. H. Vine, and the World man. The entire evening was voted a huge success, although the night was wet!

Harry F. Campbell is a very busy man these days, as well he might be, with his interests in half a dozen theaters, owned in conjunction with Mr. Samuel Grant. Mr. Campbell is also general manager and director of the Eastern Theaters Company, and holds down the job of New England manager of Warner's Features, Inc., 665 Washington street, Boston. Mr. Campbell reports that his Eastern Theaters Company has just purchased the Premier Theater, Newburyport, Mass., a 1200-seat house, costing $35,000 to erect, and also the Majestic Theater, of Keene, N. H., seating 600. Mr. Sam Grant is at present touring the country east of Chicago in the interests of Warner's Features, opening up offices, appointing district managers, etc., and will return to Boston the end of the month. Mr. Grant will then give his attention to his theaters and Mr. Campbell will have more breathing time.

Samuel Grand, of Novelty Feature Films, Inc., at 228 Tremont street, Boston, is doing a nice business these days, and has enlarged his scope of operations so as to include all kinds of motion picture supplies.

Herman Rifkin, general manager of the Eastern Feature Film Company, at 224 Tremont street, Boston, is now buying two new features weekly.

"Buck" Stein, formerly in charge of the Universal Exchange at Springfield, Mass., is now road man for the Eastern Feature Film Company, and is calling on all his friends.

Messrs. Peirce and Barton have taken the Dreamland Theater, Beverly, Mass., back again. The house was sold, but the new owners were unable to make payments as required. Peirce & Barton are offering vaudeville and Warner's Features.

Charlie Higginbotham opened his beautiful new photoplay theater at Holyoke, Mass., last Monday, to a crowded house. The new Suffolk Theater is the name and the theater is distinctly superior to most in every way. It is fireproof and modern. Vaudeville and pictures form the programs.

The Globe Amusement Company, of Bangor, Me., is a new incorporation, with the promoters named as Leslie B. Allen, I. Sheehan, of Bangor, and A. W. Hall, of Dexter. This is a $10,000 corporation

Indignation at Sunday motion picture shows was expressed this week at a meeting of Wakefield, Mass., pastors. The selectmen granted Charles W. Hodgdon, proprietor of the local photoplay theater, permission to run a show last Sunday. Although the show was advertised all last week, no protests were made. A petition is to be presented to the Selectmen by the members of the Congregational Church, asking them to revoke the Sunday license. Such absurd opposition on the part of the clergy against the showing of perfectly moral pictures on Sunday, is growing rapidly in Massachusetts cities.

Dwight C. Hutchings has been elected president of the Moving Picture Operators' Union, Boston local. President James E. Burke, resigned because of business reasons. Mr. Hutchings was the first president of the union, which was the first organization of moving picture operators in this country. Business Agent William C. Franke, and Harry Danto were elected delegates to the New England convention of Theatrical Stage Employees and Moving Picture Operators' Unions, held October 12, at Manchester, N. H. Max Hutchings and John Maloney were named as delegates.

Business Agent W. C. Franke, of the Boston Local, Moving Picture Operators' Union, was named as a candidate for a trustee of the Boston Central Labor Union, and John J. Barry, of the Theatrical Stage Employees' Union, was nominated for the office of vice-president.

The 1914 legislative program of the Massachusetts State Branch, A. F. of L., includes this amendment: "License laws for moving picture operators."

Sixteen moving picture exhibitors of New Bedford, Mass., have succeeded in the organization of a local mutual benefit association. Practically every photoplay house in New Bedford is enrolled.

Considerable interest is being exhibited by the New England trade in the General Films' new exclusive service. Manager Skates, of the Boston offices, is busily exploiting this new idea of the General's, and is making an impression.

Charlie Stern, lately with General Manager J. A. Eslow, of the New England Universal Film Exchange, Boston, has decided he does not care for the position of New England manager of the World Special Films Corporation, and tendered his resignation soon after accepting the new position. Mr. Stern may return to Mr. Eslow.

Kieran Kelty has resigned as manager of the Opera House, St. John, N. B.

The friends of Joseph Criddle, one of S. Z. Poli's best managers at Worcester, Mass., were worried to learn that he is seriously ill with a complication of diseases.

The Empire Theater, Portland, Me., is now opened. Pictures form the programs and business is reported as fair.

W. K. Stark, manager of the Edmonton, Can., Exhibition Association, is a very busy man these days, but expects to visit Boston soon.

EXCLUSIVE SERVICE

This ingenious solution of the problem which has so long worried and thwarted exhibitors in crowded competitive localities and proprietors of first class houses everywhere, was put to practial test less than a month ago. Its success has been amazing.

EXCLUSIVE SERVICE

Consists of three selected and perfectly balanced weekly programs of films made by the ten leading manufacturers of the world, and furnished to only one exhibitor in each district. No competitor can secure the same program or any part of it within three months, and no long contracts are required.

The Portola, a motion picture theater at Edmonton, Can., opened originally by Grant Churchill, has been sold to Messrs. J. A. Campbell and Thomas L. Girard. Mr. Campbell will take up the active management of the Portola, and is a Chicago man of considerable experience in this business. The Portola is to be brought to a higher plane of program, and musical programs will be added attractions, as well as special features.

A green room and press club has been formed in Lynn, Mass., with Goeffrey L. Whalen, moving picture lecturer of the Olympia Theater as president, William Batson, vice-president, Matthew Slattery, secretary, H. Newhall, treasurer, and John O'Donnell financial secretary.

"Quo Vadis?" was the feature attraction at the Opera House, Lawrence, Mass., and Manager Julius Cahn reported a big week's business.

Joseph A. McConville, manager of the new Portland Theater, Portland, Me., offered the Famous Players' Feature of Lillie Langtry in "His Neighbor's Wife," this week, and business responded well to this unusual production. Mr. McConville says: "Famous Players' for mine."

Manager William E. Reeves, of the Big Nickle Theater, Portland, Me., is finding business very geed and says that his new front and enlarged entrance is the cause. A great deal is now being done for the Big Nickle in the way of increased illumination on the front.

Manager D. D. Leader, of the new Empire Theater, Oak and Congress streets, Portland, Me., opened his house for its initial performance on October 8. The policy of the house is announced as ten reels of pictures. The house is modern and was erected during the past summer. A continuous show is to be given, starting at 10.30 A. M., and closing about 11 P. M. A gold fibre screen is a special feature at the Empire, and other innovations are: A wonder clock, an automatic ticket seller, motor-driven motion picture machines, and a "dramagraph." Opinion as to the future of the Empire seems to be somewhat at variance.

The Kinemacolor Theater, at Vancouver, B. C., is now to be known as the Colonial Theater. Feature reels are the basis of this theater's shows.

J. N. Carr, manager of William Fox's theater at New Britain, Conn., has inaugurated "Country Store Night," on Wednesdays, and Friday is the night for professional try-outs. Mr. Carr finds trade very satisfactory, with vaudeville and pictures.

Manager E. L. Knight, of the Bijou Theater, at Springfield, Mass., is doing a good business, even if competition is keen in this city. Such features as "Queen Elizabeth," with Sarah Bernhardt, and "Quincy Adams Sawyer," explain the reason.

The Lion Theater, a Springfield photoplay house, has just reopened, with straight picture programs, after having been closed since early summer.

Both Smith's Theater and the Nickel, of Woonsocket, R. I., report good business. Photoplays and songs exclusively turn the trick here.

Manager Will White, of the Academy Theater, Lowell, Mass., is a strong believer in good pictures at any cost. Famous Players' films have been booked into this house by Harry Asher, of the Famous Players' Company.

R. Wolf, manager of the Alhambra Theater, at Lowell, uses J. A. Eslow's Universal program. "I'm more than satisfied with Mr. Eslow's service," says Mr. Wolf, and he is usually hard to please.

Business is now picking up in this section, according to general report. Most of the exhibitors think it is about time the turn came.

HENRY.

PHILADELPHIA.

CONDITIONS of the moving picture business in Philadelphia at the present time are most satisfactory. Every house in the city, with few exceptions, are being patronized to full capacity.

Film exchange and supply men report an increased volume of business, and state that the demand for exceptionally good features is increasing.

A number of extensive improvements are about to be made to the Victoria Theater, Ninth and Market Streets, which will add greatly to the beauty of the place.

Work is about completed on the Regent Theater of Alexander R. Boyd, Seventeenth and Market Streets, and it will be opened to the public about the middle of October.

The Forepaugh Theater, Eighth and Vine Streets, is undergoing extensive alterations.

J. O'Keefe, one of the prominent exhibitors of Atlantic City, was a recent Philadelphia visitor. He reported excellent business with the aid of the Famous Players' productions.

The Lancaster Family Theater Company, of Atlantic City, N. J., has been granted a charter under the laws of Delaware, with a capital of $2,000. The incorporators are: William W. Miller, William M. Pyle and Joseph S. Miller.

Myer Davidow, of Reading, Pa., has let a contract for a new theater to be erected at that place, which will have a seating capacity of 1,150. The building will be of brick and concrete with mosaic trimmings and the total cost including interior furnishings will be over $60,000.

William Fegley, who operates a string of moving picture houses throughout the state, will build another house in Bloomsburg, Pa., costing $15,000.

The Philadelphia Film Exchange recently opened a branch at Reading, which is under the management of S. H. Hochfeld, in the Palace Theater Building.

The DuPont Theater, Wilmington, Del., opened October 20. The interior decorations are most unique.

The United Film Corporation of New York City has been granted a charter under the laws of Delaware, with a capital of $1,000,000. The incorporators are: Frederick J. Crolins and William S. Milliken.

The Crosky Amusement Company is having plans prepared for a moving picture theater to cost about $30,000, to be erected at Market and Salford Streets.

The Erie Theater, at the northeast corner of Marshall Street and Erie Avenue, has been sold by Albert M. Greenfield for the Erie Amusement Company to a syndicate headed by James J. Springer, which now controls the Plaza Theater, at Broad and Porter Streets, and numerous other theaters throughout the city.

The New England Amusement Company, of Providence, R. I., has been chartered under the laws of Delaware, with a capital of $75,000. John Williams, of Providence, is the chief incorporator.

A private performance of the six-reel feature, "The Betrothed," was given recently at the Bijou Dream, 1205 Market Street, to a large number of exhibitors, who praised it highly.

Owing to the increase in his business, Lewis M. Swaab is again obliged to move his establishment to more commodious quarters. On or about November 1 he will occupy the Swaab Building, now in course of erection at 1327 Vine Street. The main floor will consist of a storeroom, 18 by 80 feet, with the offices being located there. The upper floors will be devoted to manufacturing and repair work. When completed the Swaab plant will be one of the finest of its kind in Philadelphia.

"Money's Merciless Might," one of the releases of the Prince Feature Film Company, is being booked by almost every exhibitor in Philadelphia and vicinity.

The Park Theater, in Atlantic City, is now supplying its own "weekly" of current events at that popular shore resort.

Frank Buhler, of the Bijou Dream, announces that they have booked the Famous Players' productions for their new Regent Theater, which will be opened in a month's time.

I. Summerfield, of the Improved Features, has returned from a European tour with a large number of feature films, of which he has the exclusive right in the United States.

M. Siegel, of the Attractive Features, has left on an extended trip throughout Pennsylvania, with the thought of visiting every exhibitor in the state.

Charles Throp, manager of Nixon Grand Opera House, Broad Street and Montgomery Avenue, reports an overflowing attendance each night since opening his theater. This is not the only theater that Mr. Throp has successfully managed; he is also the manager of the Coliseum, Jumbo, People's and Plaza.

M. J. Dorn, the well-known feature film man, now occupies a desk at the Union Feature Film Company's place of business.

John Love, manager of the Imperial Theater, Sixtieth and Walnut Streets, reports excellent business during the past summer, and he has announced that from now on he will book extra large productions as added attractions.

Announcement has been made that plans for a new theater to be erected at Sixty-third Street and Haverford Avenue have been completed and work on the building will be started shortly. The theater, which will be of the very latest type, will have a seating capacity of about 1,500. The new house will be called the "Overbrook."

D. Wilson, of poster fame, expects to open a mounting plant on Vine Street in the near future.

CONGDON.

IN THE MIDDLE WEST.

THE State of Missouri is sending ou ta series of moving pictures on poultry raising, accompanied by a lecturer who is an authority on chickens. The exhibitions are followed by an informal discussion of the best methods by the farmers and others.

Andrew Koval, Sr., has severed his connection with the Pastime Moving Picture Theater, at Diamond, Ind., and gone to Clinton, Ind., where he will be connected with a photoplay house.

The ordinance demanding wider aisles, more exits and better fireproof arrangements in Omaha, Neb., houses has been passed by the city commission, and City Electrician M. J. Curran has arranged to make a large number of the inspections personally.

Moving pictures will be used extensively by the Jewish Educational Alliance, 901 Carr Street, St. Louis, Mo., in its educational work. A class in the education of immigrants will offer special opportunities for the use of films.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

MISSOURI.

AUTHORITIES of Kansas City, Mo., recently passed an ordinance prohibiting the exhibition of motion picture films depicting robberies, murders, indecent or immoral scenes. The passage of the ordinance was followed by the seizure of a three-reel film showing the escapades of the Dalton boys. The film was manufactured at Coffeyville, Kan., by private interests. They were warned that the film would be destroyed if found in Kansas City again.

The "Dalton Boys" was being shown in a picture house in Main Street, when the authorities interfered. Frederick F. McClure, recreation superintendent of the public welfare board, witnessed the pictures and decided they were immoral enough to be barred. Both film and display matter were returned to the owners later.

Mr. McClure has announced that a vigorous censorship will be maintained in Kansas City in the future and that all films must be of the sort that are worthy of emulation by the youngsters who see them. Just what this means is not known by Kansas City exhibitors. The situation is rather tense, in view of the attitude of those in authority. However, it is not believed that the productions of the best companies will be barred, even though they fail to meet with the approval of Mr. McClure and his associates.

The ordinance recently passed provided for the establishment of a municipal censorship. It was the intention at that time to appoint some intelligent resident of a Missouri city to censor all productions brought into the city. This plan failed to go through because of lack of money. Exhibitors do not believe there is any need for such a censorship regarding the National Board as sufficient for all purposes.

Gilbert M. Anderson, who is better known as "Broncho Billy," delighted film fans recently by stopping over in Kansas City to witness the "Candy Shop," his own musical production.

Sundays would be quiet days in Kansas City if the Epworth League Union of the Methodist Church of Greater Kansas City had its way. All that the E. L. U. of the M. C. of G. K. C. wants is the closing of theaters, moving picture and otherwise, baseball parks and all other amusement places on Sunday. A resolution to this effect was adopted. Inasmuch as both the moving picture men and the baseball magnates find Sunday an occasion of joy, somewhat of a riffle was caused by the meeting mentioned. The agitation is expected to die a natural death, however. Moving picture men smiled when they thought of the Kansas City American Association ball park being closed on Sunday afternoon. The franchise is owned by George Tebeau, who bears the reputation of being one of the David Harems of baseball, C. McGillicuddy being his only superior in the art of getting coin with little or no effort.

A notable addition to the roster of moving picture theaters in Kansas City is the Lyric Theater, formerly the Century. The Century formerly was a burlesque house, but recently was squeezed out. It has been decided to run three reels of pictures with one vaudeville act. The change is taking well with followers of the animated films, and Manager Joe Donegan is much pleased with the results of the innovation.

MURRAY.

INDIANAPOLIS.

CHARLES OLSEN and B. V. Barton, owners of the Lyric Theater in this city, and interested in other motion picture enterprises, have prepared to expand their interests on a large scale. They have organized the People's Amusement Company, which has been incorporated with an authorized capitalization of $50,000. The first step of the new company is being taken in the erection of a new motion picture house at Sixteenth and Hudson Streets, which will have a seating capacity of eight hundred and will cost $20,000. It is to be of brick and fireproof construction. In December the company will undertake the construction of a new motion picture house at 115 North Illinois Street, in the downtown district, which will be modeled after the Isis Theater, in Denver. It will have a seating capacity of eight hundred, be of fireproof construction and cost $30,000. Later the company contemplates invading other cities in the state.

Anton Schmidt, a retired business man, has let contracts for and has begun the erection of a motion picture theater, at Shelby and Raymond Streets, in what promises to be excellent territory. It is to be a one-story brick structure, fireproof throughout and will cost approximately $10,000. The building will be 50 by 75 feet and will have a seating capacity of about five hundred.

Contracts are soon to be let by John Victor and John Hubert for a motion picture theater to be erected at 786 Indiana Avenue. The plans call for a one-story brick and fireproof structure to cost approximately $8,000. There will be a seating capacity of about six hundred.

The "Quo Vadis?" pictures had a successful run at the English Theater the week of October 6.

LOUISVILLE.

THE longest run ever made by any motion picture attraction in Louisville was that of the pictures taken by members of Captain Scott's party in their dash for the South Pole. These films were shown at the Masonic Theater for two full weeks, and drew large audiences twice a day.

The latest release of the Famous Players' Company, showing Henry E. Dixey in one of his old-time successes, "Chelsea 7750," went remarkably well at the Majestic Theater during the four days of its engagement there last week.

The Palace Theater, of Louisville, operated by Riordan & Riech, broke its records for attendance during the running of the Imp feature, "Uncle Tom's Cabin," last week.

H. B. Struby, proprietor of the Empire Theater, of Louisville, recently made arrangements for the second run of the Universal program in the Falls City. Mr. Struby, whose house is located in a good residence district, has been enjoying a good business, and is enthusiastic over the possibilities of the neighborhood theater.

R. L. Shrader, Louisville manager of the Central Film Service Company, was in Indianapolis last week on a short business trip to the general offices of the company.

William E. Riley, who is credited with being the principal promoter of the Perry Centennial Celebration, which held the boards in Louisville in a highly successful manner a few weeks ago, is said to be trying to close a deal for the purchase of the Westonia Theater, in Portland, one of the older parts of Louisville.

P. B. Elliott, manager of the Union Film Company, of Indianapolis, Ind., was in Louisville this week with a new lot of feature films, which were eagerly seized upon by Louisville exhibitors.

One of the most important happenings of the week in moving picture circles in Louisville was the decision of the Harry K. Lucas Film Company to discontinue its Louisville branch. All of the company's equipment in Louisville has already been moved back to the general office at Atlanta, Ga. The service list handled by the company in Louisville and vicinity has been turned over to Miss B. A. Plessinger, who operates the Independent Film Exchange.

Rev. Philip Ackerman, of the Church of St. Philip Neri, who recently purchased full equipment for the operation of a first-class picture show, has been familiarizing himself with the outfit, and about November 1 will start giving exhibitions in Windhurst Hall, which is connected with the church. Educational and comedy films will be used.

The New Grand Theater at Twenty-seventh and Portland Avenue has a new manager in the person of Joe Everich, owner Berger finding that his other duties made too great a call upon his time to enable him to give the show the proper amount of attention.

The exceptionally meritorious programs being offered by him enables D. Levinson, of the Novelty Theater, which has the first run in Louisville of the Universal program, to handle packed houses right along.

The Switow Amusement Company, of Louisville, recently perfected arrangements with Fred Evans, of North Vernon, Ind., whereby the company will lease a $10,000 theater to be built by Mr. Evans on Madison Avenue. The contract has already been let for the building, which is to be of brick. The lease covers a period of ten years, an option going with it to purchase the property at any time during the term of the lease for $17,500.

The newest theater of the Switow string, the New Grand, of New Albany, Ind., was opened last week with great success. The theater is much the handsomest in New Albany, and is one of the finest in Indiana. The offering of vaudeville and moving pictures was exceptionally good for the opening week, and the management promises that this standard will be kept up. The house has a seating capacity of a thousand, and the stage, 30 by 25 feet, is amply large for the most elaborate vaudeville stage settings.

Clarence Owens, of Crab Orchard, Ky., has about completed his new house at that place, and plans to open it some time during the week of October 20.

The Lexington Theater Company, proprietor of the new Hippodrome Theater, of Lexington, Ky., announced recently that the house will be opened before November 1, and a fine vaudeville program, supplemented by motion pictures, has been arranged for the first week. The house seats 900 persons, and is said to be the finest of its size in the South. There are twelve boxes, six lowers and six uppers, on each side of the theater. Two balconies have been built, the top one being reserved for colored people only. The house is as nearly fireproof as it can be built, according to the management, and with its numerous features of beauty and comfort is assured of success from the outset.

A motion picture theater for colored people only will be built in Lexington, Ky., by Robert H. Gray, colored, who is the manager of a newly completed colored hotel in that city. The proposed theater, according to plans which have been approved, is to be a brick structure, 30 by 65 feet, with a 35-foot lobby, and will be equipped in a first-class manner. It will have a seating capacity of about 200.

The Crescent Amusement Company, of Bowling Green, Ky., operating the Columbia and Elite Theaters, has secured a desirable site on the public square for a new motion picture theater, and plans will be drawn as soon as possible for the company's third house in Bowling Green. It is announced that the new house will have a seating capacity of about 500, upholstered opera chairs being used, and that its equipment will otherwise be in every respect of the most modern description. It will be a five-cent house.

Mayor Lee, of Maysville, Ky., has laid down the law, and hereafter no picture show in that town will be allowed to operate on Sunday. The mayor came to the conclusion a few days ago, on seeing the advertisement of one of the shows, that such things should not be allowed on the first day of the week, and issued his edict accordingly. There is no objection to the kind of shows offered, Sunday closing being the only point involved.

After experiencing considerable difficulty with the projecting machine and the electric current on the opening night, Manager Fawcett's new picture theater at Sebree, Ky., has started running in good shape, the mechanical difficulties referred to having been overcome. Good houses have been the rule from the start, and Mr. Fawcett is much pleased with prospects for a successful season.

Arthur Burch, 50 years of age, the proprietor of a tent motion picture show at Underwood, Ind., was severely wounded by a knife in the hand of a one-armed man at that place recently. Thurman Bobo, the picture man's assailant, was cutting his way into the tent when the trouble started, culminating in Burch's injury.

S. W. Cloyd, of Campbellsville, Ind., has purchased an interest in the motion picture theater at that place, and will operate it with Joe Willock, who has been interested in the house for some time.

IN THE NORTHWEST.

P. R. MATSON, of Fairmont, Minn., is reported to be contemplating opening a picture house at Flandreau, S. D.

Vaudeville and moving pictures will be the policy of a new house to be opened in Chehalis Avenue, in Chehalis, Wash., by R. B. Bement and F. G. Kellogg, of Tacoma.

The commission named by the state of Washington to prepare a state exhibit at the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco in 1915 wants to use moving pictures extensively. It is planned to include in the state building a room seating 500 persons, and in this, films showing the apple-growing, mining, and fishing industries and scenes in the most beautiful cities will be shown.

Walter Belter has been remodeling a building at Ceylon, Minn., to be used for a picture show.

L. F. Cowan has sold the Imperial Theater, a picture house at Great Falls, Mont., to the Imperial Theater Company. H. D. Kennedy and Donald Gibson are interested in the new firm.

Professor Eugene Beardsley, of the state teachers' college at Greeley, Colo., is using moving pictures to instruct the classes in biology. Films showing animal and insect life are numerous and these are being selected.

H. A. Martin has purchased the interest of Mrs. S. L. Doving in the Crystal Theater, at Alexandria, Minn.

The municipal censorship plan has been abandoned in North Yakima, Wash., where the five censors were dismissed by the city commissioners. An ordinance was passed fixing a license fee for the photoplay houses which provided that if any citizen can prove that objectionable pictures are shown the permit will be revoked by the city.

H. A. Fowler, of Madison, S. D., has purchased the Howard Moving Picture Theater, at Alexandria, Minn., from Costello & Hubbell.

A correspondent of Mayor Perkins, of Denver, Colo., has written to him suggesting that the three censors lecture on the consequences of crime whenever any picture portraying murder or robbery is shown in a Denver Theater.

Manager Cutts, of the American Theater, at Butte, Mont., took several hundred feet of film of a local department store, which was used by the concern to exploit its fall fashion show. In addition to the latest styles the crowds and employees in the store were photographed.

The work of the men at the mine rescue station at Kellogg, Mont., was recently photographed, to be used in disseminating information concerning this feature of mining throughout the state.

Manager J. T. Horne has closed the Lyric Moving Picture Theater, at Logan City, Utah, and opened the new Lyric, which seats 800 persons. The new house was opened with a seven-reel show. Dramatic attractions will be played, only the open dates being filled by photoplays.

English & Anderson are now operating the Plaza Theater, at Springfield, Minn.

The state immigration commission of Minnesota is sending out with its state exhibit car several reels showing farming and industrial conditions in that state. The pictures will be shown in Iowa, Missouri and western Illinois.

Mrs. William Plummer, manager of the Scenic, the oldest moving picture house in Yankton, S. D., used some original ideas in putting on three-reel war pictures. Sixteen young women, attired in field uniforms loaned by the local company of national guards, and skirts to match gave some intricate military drills and later posed in a number of patriotic tableaux.

The new two-story brick building to be erected by L. D. Baird, at Austin, Minn., will house a moving picture show.

E. O'Keefe, of Great Falls, Mont., has purchased the interest of G. H. Bailey in the Theatorium, at Billings, Mont., and has assumed the management of the house. The same policy of pictures will prevail.

McConahy & Card, of Spokane, Wash., were selected to film the Border Days celebration, at Grangeville, Idaho.

The Lyric Theater has been opened at Dickenson, N. D., with pictures and vaudeville.

The Culbertson Moving Picture Company has been formed at Culbertson, Mont., and has leased the Fireman's Hall, where they will give moving picture shows Tuesday and Friday nights of each week. Sam J. Frybling is manager and Fred Nelsen and Andrew Peterson are associated with him.

MICHIGAN.

CONFLICT over the inspection of motion pictures in the state of Michigan by members of the state fire marshal's department continues. At Grand Rapids the marshal and all of his deputies were enjoined by Judge Willis B. Perkins, of the circuit court, from interfering with the operating room of the Powers Theater or in any way annoying the lessee, Henry G. Sommers. The Powers Theater Building Association, which secured the injunction, declared that when the building was constructed it was in conformity with the plans for safety demanded by the Grand Rapids building inspector and that to make other changes at the whim of inspectors was a hardship. The Wayne county circuit court also rendered a decision which prevents the marshal's department from interfering with picture shows in Wayne. That city had in effect, at the time the state law became operative, an ordinance regulating photoplay houses. The court decided that the state law could not abrogate the local ordinance and that the jurisdiction of the fire marshal should be concurrent with that of the local authorities. State Marshal John Winship says this decision will be appealed to the Supreme Court. Inspector Shafer, of the marshal's office, has finished an inspection in the copper country on the upper peninsula and found most of the houses complying with the law. When he arrived at Palatka to inspect the only house in the village he asked the station agent where he could find it. "Just follow the crowd," replied the railroad man, "and you'll come to it." Shafer followed and found the theater in flames. It was completely destroyed.

Fred Tedder will open a picture show in Marine City.

C. Louis Flash, manager for the Princess Theater, at Windsor, Ont., was fined $50 and costs for operating a picture machine without a license. The operator is said to have left the booth for a few minutes and Flash chanced to be operating when an inspector happened along.

Lawson & Paoli's moving picture house at Atlantic was recently destroyed by fire. The machine, a new piano and several hundred chairs were consumed. The loss of $700 was partly covered by insurance.

J. L. Brown, of Pontiac has purchased the Temple Theater, at Howell, from A. W. Boardman. Ferris Aldrich was installed as manager.

The Star Theater, at Marquette, is installing a new balcony and a modern ventilating system.

ROBERT JAMES and Fred Gross who have purchased the Crystal Theater at Nelsonville from E. T. Mitchell will improve the house.

James Barton has sold the Dreamland theater at Napoleon to T. J. Edwards.

The Chackeres Amusement Company of Springfield has been granted a charter by the state and will operate a new moving picture theater on South Limestone Street. The company which is authorized to have capital stock of $60,000, was incorporated by Louis and Harry Chackeres and John Gregory.

The Exhibitors' Film Company, of Toledo, has been incorporated, with capital stock of $25,000, to do a general film business. The incorporators are: Sigmund Sanger, Aaron E. Cohn, E. C. Forelich, Vada C. Southard and Trude Wooster.

The Majestic, the new motion picture house on High street in Columbus, will be completed some time this fall, it is expected. The house, when finished, will be the largest exclusive photoplay theater in the city. It will seat 1,200 persons.

August C. Caleb, owner of the Ezella moving picture theater, one of the largest houses in Columbus, has incorporated his business under the name of the Victor Amusement Company. The incorporators of the concern, which is authorized to have capital stock of $35,000, are: Anna Caleb, Julia A. Lucas, W. W. Lucas, Pearl S. Black, George A. Caleb and August C. Caleb.

The exhibition at the Grand Opera House, in Youngstown, of the pictures of that city, taken by Maurice Geiger, was quite a local event. Miss Ruth Holzbach, who took the leading part in "The Fireman's Bride," which gave the local department a chance to exhibit its apparatus and ability appeared in person at each performance.

IN THE SOUTHWEST.

CADETS at the Texas Agricultural and Mechanical College at College Station will operate a moving picture show on the campus, and when the weather becomes too inclement will seek an indoor location. The nearest show has been at Bryan and the interest of the students in this kind of attraction was so great that the faculty decided to provide entertainment at home. The films will be censored.

Thomason & Elliott have opened a moving picture show in the school house auditorium at Garvin, Okla.

The Dallas Theater, at Dallas, recently made up an unusual week's program of Texas pictures. This included a ball game between the Dallas and Fort Worth teams, views of Dallas, Fort Worth, "Lasca," from the famous poem, featuring Miss Martha Russell and several multiple reel productions, the scenes of which were laid in Texas.

The Metropolitan Amusement Company, of Oklahoma City, Okla., has been incorporated with a capital stock of $5,000. The incorporators are H. W. and Martha Munsen and Joseph Rowett, of Oklahoma City.

The Majestic Theater, at Iola, Kan., has been re-opened as a picture house by Howard Wheaton, Wilbur Shields and Jack Hering. An orchestra rounds out the three-reel performance.

Rosser Brothers have removed their picture show in Ringer, Okla., to a new location.

The Empress Theater, at Oklahoma City, Okla., is now operated as a combined picture and vaudeville house. The house is featuring the productions of the Famous Players' Film Company.

A merger of the Baker and McGaffey picture shows at Luling, Tex., has been effected following the purchase of both houses by R. B. Moses and George Caldwell.

The Industrial Moving Picture Company, of Oklahoma City, Okla., has closed a contract with the Panama exposition commission of that state, whereby the company is to take 50,000 feet of films in all the important cities of the state. These are to be shown throughout Oklahoma and the funds will be used to erect the state building at the exposition in San Francisco.

The Laredo Theater Company, of Laredo, Tex., has been incorporated by J. W. Dellman and others.

L. E. Ellis has leased the Scenic airdome, at Erick, Okla.

The S. C. Light and Power Company has purchased the Cozy Theater, at Rosenberg, Tex., from Lane & Davis.

Glen Wagner, a singer of some reputation, has opened the Imp Theater, at 111 East Sixth Street, in Topeka, Kan., and will operate it as a picture house.

R. T. Wiley has leased the Sayre auditorium, at Sayre, Okla.

The State Board of Control, of Arizona, has decided to purchase moving picture machines for all the state institutions. It has not been decided whether to rent films or buy them outright.

O. C. Bixley has purchased the Princess Theater on South El Paso Street, in El Paso, Tex., from J. M. Lewis and V. B. Andreas.

Manager I. B. Simon has opened his new Best Theater, at Pine Bluff, Ark. It is a strictly modern house which will be devoted to photoplays. Guy Redmond, formerly operator at the Royal Theater in Little Rock, will be in charge of the operating room. Al Thurburn is leader of the five-piece orchestra.

Sterling Ramage has leased the West Theater, at Paton, New Mex.

City commissioners of Hutchinson, Kan., refused to lease the convention hall in that city to Hugh Jamieson of Kansas City, for a picture show on the ground that they did not believe that the city ought to compete with the theaters already established. Jamieson proposed to include Hutchinson in a circuit with Wichita, Salina and Topeka, giving shows at Hutchinson once a week.

M. Wicks, of Houston, Tex., has leased a building in Wharton, Tex., to be used for a picture show.

Among Texas cities which have been filmed recently or are about to be are New Braunfels, Brownwood and Marshall. At Marshall the reels took the form of a playlet by Miss Stella Myers depicting the troubles of a chaperon while the sights of the city were being shown. At Brownwood a big comedy film was the feature, while at New Braunfels all the attractions of the city were pictured.

The Orpheum Theater has been opened as a picture house at San Angelo, Tex.

H. W. Charles, superintendent of the Kansas Boys State Industrial School at Topeka, has announced that once a week educational pictures will be shown to the inmates.

Manager W. C. Blackstone, of the Rosy Theater, at Chickasha, Okla., has secured a more suitable location for his show, having leased the building now occupied by the Farmers' State Bank.

F. L. McLeod has asked the city council of Fort Worth, Tex., for a permit to operate a picture show at 12[illegible] West Exchange Street, in that city.

The Princess Theater, at Rockdale, Tex., which has been operated as an airdome featuring pictures during the summer, has substituted opera chairs for its outdoor seats and will be operated this winter.

[illegible] C. Baker will operate a picture show in the [illegible] building, which is being remodeled, at [illegible], Tex.

Moving picture theaters in Hutchinson, Kan., are reported to have raised the price of admission to ten cents. A similar movement was on foot in Wichita, Kan., but a minority of exhibitors is blamed for the failure to make the increase.

Manager Dan Powell, of the Colonial Theater, at Wichita, Kan., offered a reward of $25 for the conviction of a youth who yelled "fire" and nearly caused a panic in his picture house.

A merchants' matinee from 10 a. m. to 2 p. m., with a reduced admission of 5 cents, is a feature of the new Crystal Theater, 1608 Elm Street, Dallas, Tex., which has been opened by G. K. Jorgensen. M. D. Singleton will manage the house. A Japanese design is carried out in the construction of the theater, which cost $100,000. A Hope-Jones unit orchestra will furnish the music. Helen Gardener, in "A Sister to Carmen," was the feature for the two opening days.

E. G. Nelson, of Kanapolis, Kan., has purchased the Electric Theater, at Afton, Okla., from Charles Kaff.

The Lyric Motion Picture Theater, at Hot Springs, Ark., which, with the other houses, was compelled to close following the big fire in that city, has re-opened with new equipment and new lighting arrangement.

Huber Brothers have leased a building on West Main Street, in Ada., Okla., and will open a picture show.

ILLINOIS.

STATE Fire Marshal Frank S. Morgaridge has issued a bulletin giving the specifications for safety equipment in moving pictures. If the policy of the department is to be aggressive it has not been indicated, but inspectors will insist upon the enforcement of the state law.

The Enamar Amusement Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $2,500. The incorporators are Max Jesselson, Richard Israel and W. W. Maxwell.

Rev. Mr. Hartley, pastor of the Christian Church at Homer, is doing good work in championing the use of the moving picture. He was recently selected for an address at a church congress at Davenport, Ia., and took for his subject "The Affiliation of the Moving Picture Business with the Church and Educational Work of the Country." His work is unusual, in that it is not proposed to take the pictures into the church, but to co-operate with the local manager. This formed the theme of his talk at the Davenport meeting. "This co-operation," he said, "would improve the picture shows morally and financially because of the co-operation of church people all over the country. I would like to see the poor man brought into church off the streets, and I think that the moving picture machine might be a means by which we can reach the man who does not like to come to church to hear a minister preach and a choir sing." A chautauqua was held this summer at Homer, which became famous for counties around because of its Sunday meetings. "I might say that it is due to moving pictures that were given free in the evenings that a great many people were attracted to the park, and especially was this true in regard to the people who are not in the habit of attending church in this community." Religious and educational pictures were used in these programs. It is not improbable that a movement may be begun by Central Illinois ministers to have picture houses give over one day each week to religious films. The editor of the Lookout, a publication for young people of the Christian church, has endorsed such a plan. In a letter to Mr. Hartley praising him for his work with the pictures, he added, "I believe that you have launched a work that ought to be helpful and popular in hundreds of towns and cities. Why not turn this whole scheme into a national organization or corporation? If someone would work out the great number of moving pictures that could be suitably and profitably used on Sunday evenings and keep these moving from town to town and from place to place, I believe there are wonderful possibilities in the moving picture. I believe you have hold of a good rope; just pull on it with all your might and let's bring something worth while out of this move beginning in Homer."

Mrs. Rice will operate the Star Theater in the McMurtrie building, at Marshall.

M. E. Hunt and Charles Sullivan have opened the new Majestic Theater at Gibson City.

S. T. Herman has returned to the moving picture business at Sullivan, having purchased the Globe Theater from J. H. Ireland and Bert Fultz. After making some changes he reopened the house and added a reel to the program, making it a four-reel show. Herman was formerly in the photoplay business, at Monticello, Ill.

C. Douglas is now manager of the Armory Theater, at DeKalb.

The Novelty Film Company, of Chicago, has been making some historical and educational pictures at Starved Rock, near Ottawa.

The Oswego Theater at Mounds, is being enlarged. When finished it will seat 350 persons.

Ed Dodge has resigned his position as manager for the Washington Theater, at Granite City. It is said that he may engage in the moving picture business in that city.

T. B. Songer has sold his picture show at Astoria to a Mr. Duncan, of Vermont, Ill., who has taken possession.

Don C. McClellan, of Pekin, has closed a lease for a picture house now in course of construction in Kansas City.

Bert Culkins has resumed his position as piano player at the Star Photoplay Theater, in Lincoln.

A. Yeager, of Chicago, has leased the Academy of Music, at Sterling, from George Olmstead. The Kinemacolor pictures have been installed as an attraction, although the house will play drama and vaudeville. He has also leased the Dixon Opera House, at Dixon.

Clark & Pearson, who have been operating an airdome at Rushville, will not go out of business, but have been planning the erection of a building to house their picture show this winter.

R. W. Gracey has been fitting up a building at Crystal Lake to be used for his moving picture show.

E. E. Alger and Vern Corley have purchased the interest of Dave Udell in the Crystal Theater, at Paxton.

J. B. Bennett expected to have his new Colonial Theater in Urbana opened for business October 1.

The Havana Theater, at Havana, has been re-opened.

W. H. Lang has sold his moving picture show at Toledo to the Toledo band.

A storm of protest was aroused in Illinois by the announcement that a Dixon Theater planned to entertain the first group of "honor convicts" who were working on the roads near that city. Governor Dunne issued a peremptory order that the men must not be exploited or coddled. He also advised that the prisoners were not to be photographed for moving picture purposes. It was explained, however, that the Dixon manager had merely acquiesced in a local attempt to show that the convicts could be trusted.

Illinois moving picture men have been very much interested in the purchase of the state rights for the Famous Players Company pictures by Dee Robinson, of Peoria. The deal was made at the state convention and as Robinson and his associates have proved themselves live wires, some interesting exploitation of the features is promised.

The Broadway Theater, in East St. Louis, is now running multiple reel features Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings.

The Mutual Protective League, an Illinois fraternal society with headquarters at Decatur, is using moving pictures to aid its organizers in the work of interesting prospects in towns where lodges are to be formed.

The Child Welfare League of Peoria has been preparing for an exhibit by a surveillance of the moving picture houses in the city, with a view to ascertaining their influence mentally, morally and physically. This survey will contain a report of the number of children who visit the eighteen houses in Peoria, their ages, the hours they go and whether they are attended by their parents or go alone. This information will be compiled and made into charts.

The Catholic Society of Adams County has announced that it will demand clean moving pictures in its fight for a purer Quincy. At the meeting Judge Lyman McCarl, ex-officio judge of the juvenile court, said that the average child became delinquent through environment and that the child became affected through its senses, especially sight. He had nothing against moral moving pictures, he said. A fight by the league to have the mayor appoint a board of five censors for the picture houses was proposed by Father Didacus, of St. Francis college. There would be no expense to the theater owners as the men would work voluntarily.

The city council at Quincy passed a motion to notify all theater managers that the laws in regard to aisles and exits would be enforced.

The Princess Theater, at Joliet, has reduced its admission price from 10 to 5 cents.

R. O. Bell has opened the Colonial Theater at Jerseyville.

Motion picture operators of Peoria have organized a local union.

Ed Hammerle and Roy Norman are erecting a new building at Walnut to be used for a moving picture show.

Managers of photoplay houses at Marion have asked the city council to reduce the license fee, which is $100 a year. They point out that in the neighboring towns of the same class the charge is half that sum or lower.

L. L. Piper and W. C. Morrison have purchased the Lyric Theater, at Villa Grove, from A. L. Mann and have taken possession.

A contractor who recently bid on a sewer job at DeKalb, appeared before the Board of Local Improvements and proposed to show them moving pictures of his ditching machine at work—an argument for employing modern equipment to secure satisfactory results.

Manager Gaschen has opened the Idle Hour Theater, a picture house at Huntley. The interior has been remodeled and redecorated.

Manager Padelford was forced to postpone the opening of his new Lyric Theater in the Burton building, at Batavia, for a few days because a change was being made in the lighting system in the city. The new house has a seating capacity of 300 persons, is done in green and brown and features an electric organ.

THIEVES (Nov. 10).—While out walking with his beautiful young ward, Myrtel, Millionaire Hastings allows Myrtel to give some money to a poor, miserable-looking fellow, who arouses her sympathy. Before returning to his palatial home, the aged man is taken ill, and has to go to bed when he reaches the house.

Living with him is George Hastings, a brother, and George's wife, Anna. They do not seem to be sorry when Hastings is taken ill; it would appear as though they were glad. When, some weeks later, they are standing by the bedside, Anna stealthily opens a writing desk and takes from it a paper. Signaling to George, they leave the room together and go to the library below. By means of the paper, which contains the combination, they open the family safe and take out a number of papers. Among these papers are two wills, one leaving all to George, and a later one deeding the great wealth to Myrtel. They exchange the wills in their respective envelopes, placing the one favorable to George in the envelope marked "Last Will," and the other in the envelope marked "Void." They do not know that they are being detected. Behind the window curtains is a thief. He is watching them and listening to their words. He is the same man whom Myrtel befriended, but he does not know that he is in her house. He is greatly surprised when she comes into the room taking George and Anna away to Hasting's death bed. George, in his haste, did not have time to lock the safe. The thief now uses his pocket flashlight, and locating the safe, takes the papers out and changes back the wills in their right envelopes. He jumps to his place of concealment as Anna comes back and goes to the safe, taking out the envelope which she believes contains the Myrtel will and burns it in the grate. The thief jumps towards her after she has burned the paper, and, at the point of a revolver, takes the paper with the combination from her, and locks the rightful will in the safe. Then he sneaks away, happy that he has made his benefactress an heiress.

THE PRICE OF THOUGHTLESSNESS (Nov. 11).—The children are gathered in the school room, listening to a lecturer, who, with pointer and charts, discourses upon the dangers of the city street and shows how to avoid them. When he is through he presents each child with a safety button as a reminder, of his advice. Howard, Mabel and Bobby remain after the other children to ask a few additional questions. After school Bobby lives up to the button by notifying the police of a live wire he discovers on the car track. He is praised by the crowd on the scene for his thoughtfulness. Through Howard's carelessness little Mabel narrowly escapes death when she falls in front of a street car, and is saved by the safety device on the car. She is crossing the track with Howard. Both are on roller skates. Running in front of a northbound car, they suddenly discover that a car coming south is heading them off. Howard jumps to safety, but his sister is not so quick and falls before the car. An automobile coming south on the avenue stalls, forcing a wagon to cut in to the left between the elevated railroad posts onto the car track in order to pass. Just as the wagon is hauled onto the track the car crashes into it, crumbling it to pieces and crushing the driver beneath the wreckage, all due to thoughtlessness. Some boys are playing ball on a side street. Howard, the catcher, misses the ball, which bounds away across the car track on the avenue. He runs after it blindly, and suddenly realizes that he is between two cars. Bewildered, he leaps for safety, jumping in front of a speeding automobile, which runs over him. Howard is crippled for life. After many days of suffering he is taken from his bed in the hospital for a ride in a roller chair. He sees boys and girls playing tag and leap-frog on the hospital lawn, and, with tear-filled eyes, realizes the terrible price of his thoughtlessness.

AN ELOPEMENT AT HOME (Nov. 12).—Billy would like to marry Mabel, the judge's pretty daughter, but he is ordered from the premises by the angry father, who selfishly wishes to keep his daughter at home. This is witnessed by the justice of the peace, a next-door neighbor, who rejoices at the judge's discomfiture. Billy and Mabel plan to elope. While the judge is sleeping peacefully, Mabel enters his room and takes all of his clothes to delay his pursuit. But when she tries to get out of the second-story window to descend by the ladder, she gets her skirt caught in the window and cannot unfasten it. Billy breaks into the house and is on his way upstairs to help Mabel, when he is met by the judge. He is taken for a burglar, and, at the point of a revolver, is locked up in the attic. Billy climbs through a trap-door onto the roof and calls to Mabel and tells her of his capture. The milkman sees the couple and is amused at their predicament. Billy throws him some money and tells him to go next door and call the justice of the peace to come and marry them in ten minutes.

The justice of the peace is tickled to death at the opportunity to vex his old political enemy. By this time the judge has discovered the theft of his clothes and suspects that he is being duped. When he hears voices outside he goes to the window and sees Billy urging the justice to marry him to Mabel. The judge angrily forbids the ceremony, but the justice laughs and, asking the milkman to remain as a witness, proceeds with the marriage. The judge wraps a blanket about himself and tries to get out of the room, but the door knob breaks and he falls back on the floor. When he returns to the window he sees the justice, the milkman and Billy and Mabel all drinking to each other's health from milk bottles. The judge fires the broken door-knob at the justice, but misses him, and all laugh at the defeated father's expostulations as Billy leans over the roof and kisses Mabel.

THE RIGHT MAN (Nov. 13).—John Strong is in love with Rose Braham. She cares for him on account of his friendship. Rose's brother, Ned, against the advice of Strong, who warns him, plunges in Lake Shore R. R. Stock, and drops all he has. He is desperate. Realizing Strong's love for Rose, he urges her to make him propose and accept him, and thereby save the situation. Rose revolts at the thought and at first refuses, but at last, in order to save her brother, she consents. Strong proposes and is accepted. In the meantime, he has seen that Lake Shore has dropped and to save the brother of the woman he loves, he throws capital behind the stock and booms it, saving the situation.

The moment he is out of danger, Ned thinks there is no reason that Rose should marry a man that she does not care for. So he goes and tells Strong that Rose desires to be released from her engagement. Strong refuses to take his dismissal from anyone but Rose herself. Ned tells Rose of what he has done and she is furious with him for his mean conduct. Then he sees in the paper that it is Strong who has saved the market, and afraid now that he will withdraw his money, he urges Rose to renew the engagement. She says she will handle the matter alone. She is sorry now, for she really loves Strong. She phones him and he comes to her. She confesses her transactions with her brother, and offers to release him, but he makes her confess that she really loves him and the engagement is renewed on a surer and firmer basis.

FANNY'S CONSPIRACY (Nov. 14).—When Mr. Burney returns home he is entirely too stout to suit Fanny, his pretty young wife. She decides that his excessive corpulency must be removed. Much to Burney's discomfort, he is put on a severe diet. Almost starved, he sneaks into the kitchen and gets the kind-hearted maid to give him some pie, chocolate cake, and doughnuts. Just as he is about to start in eating, in comes Fanny and all the food is taken from him. Fanny sends for cousin Jack Gordon. He brings some dumb bells and Indian clubs. When she is thanking him affectionately for his kindness, the inquisitive maid, peeking through the keyhole, sees her and wonders what it means. Mr. Burney is so fat he cannot stand much exercise. Though Fanny continually measures him with a tape measure and urges him to swing the clubs some more, he soon gives up exhausted. In despair, Fanny tries all sorts of remedies. She makes hubby run through the country on a hot summer's day all dressed up in sweaters and woolens. She installs a gymnasium in the house and makes him take violent exercises. She repeats the diet in a more heroic form: all to no avail. At last, seeing a fat-reducing medicine advertised, she gets a large bottle of it and puts some in his coffee. The conscientious maid sees her doing it and when Mr. Burney starts to drink the coffee she frantically stops him and tells him that it contains poison. She also tells him of Jack Gordon. Going to Gordon's house to demand an explanation, Mr. Burney finds there a torn piece of a letter signed by his wife. The fragment makes Fanny out a criminal. It speaks of a "Bottle—given secretly -unpleasant James is out of the way!" Burney gets a detective and accuses Fanny of trying to murder him. All ends happily when Gordon comes around with the other part of the letter, and Fanny produces the bottle of fat reducer which the letter speaks of.

JERRY'S MOTHER-IN-LAW (Special—2 parts—Nov. 15).—When Mr and Mrs. Jerry Brown's mother-in-law arrives she proves to be an unwelcome visitor. She upsets all the peacefulness of the new household. Jerry sneaks off to the French Students' Masque Ball, and while on his way goes into a saloon where two criminal-looking individuals sell him a suit of armor. Rigged up in the armor, Mr. Brown proceeds to the ball. All that night he spends his time rioting with the merry masqueraders and is lionized by the ladies. The next morning he returns home in a cab, and while trying to walk up the front steps, falls down in a deep sleep. The mysterious armored individual is seen from the window by wifey and mother-in-law, who are told by a passing newspaper boy that the armor was stolen from the museum. Mother-in-law calls up the museum and gets the director, who comes on the run with his assistants, and takes the armor Jerry concealed within it, to its appointed pedestal at the museum.

Mre Jerry Brown and mother-in-law go to the museum the next day to see the armor and are scared out of their wits when they see smoke curling up from the iron hand-piece. The smoke is coming from a cigarette which Jerry has found left by a visitor. They scream. Jerry jumps from his pedestal and runs from the museum. He is followed by a mob. He seeks refuge at his club, where he consoles himself with the aid of many drinks. Taking a uniform from the bellboy he goes home and is met there by his mother-in-law who was about to leave, but who now decides to stay on indefinitely. She places Jerry under the shower bath and ducks him in the tub. Getting dressed he goes to a hypnotist show and buys a book on hypnotism. Returning home he frightens mother-in-law out of the house trying to hypnotize her. She calls the police: Jerry enlists their aid. Together they scare mother-in-law so badly that she runs away and never returns. That evening Jerry and his pretty young wife celebrate the unwelcome visitor's departure with a large feast.

EDISON.

CAMPING WITH THE BLACKFEET (Nov. 10).—The pictures open in the camp of Chief Three Bears' tribe, near McDermott, in Northwestern Montana. Chief Three Bears is the last of the great war chiefs of the Blackfeet. Today, at the age of eighty-six, he is a good citizen of the United States. Chief Three Bears opens the picture by saying, in the picturesque sign language of the Northwestern Indian, that his tribe intends to break camp and to move to a new location. The chief is followed by Lazy Boy, Judge Wolf Plume, Mrs. Dog Ears and Medicine Owl, the medicine man, each of whom has something to say in this peculiar language

While the men ride ahead to the new site, the squaws remain to accomplish all the actual work of moving the equipment. Mrs. Dog Ears, an old lady of some eighty-two summers, exhibits an extraordinary degree of activity. On the way to the new camp, the men are obliged to pass across a ford just above McDermott Falls, which has a particularly dangerous reputation. Intimate views of the daily life and habits of these Indians are shown, the picture ending with a "heap big dance."

SETH'S WOODPILE (Nov. 10).—Seth Prime was by all odds the meanest man in Squashville. Everybody wondered how his wife ever stood him. One day Seth had a row with Jim Decker. Jim, passing Seth's woodpile on the evening of their quarrel, was suddenly seized with the notion to borrow a little of Seth's wood. He did not tell Seth anything about it. He simply borrowed a wheelbarrow-load of wood.

Seth discovered his loss the next day and turned white with rage. So what did Seth do but carefully hollow out a stick of wood, fill it with powder and plug it up securely. He laid this homemade engine of destruction on top of his woodpile and retired to dream pleasantly of the mangled corpses of his enemies. The next morning when he awoke the loaded stick was gone. Also another wheelbarrow-full of wood. During the night Jim Decker had decided to borrow a little more of his neighbor's wood.

Mrs. Prime was highly indignant when she discovered what her husband had done, but Seth only laughed and waited. The next day happened to be Sunday and Jim Decker went to church with his wife. The parson preached a powerful sermon against the sin of stealing. Jim was deeply moved. The weight of Seth's wood rested heavily on his conscience, so that night he loaded the wood he had taken into a wheelbarraw and stealthily replaced it on Seth's pile. The next morning Seth arose from bed grumbling and went out to bring in wood for the stove. He unwittingly picked up the loaded stick and put it in his kitchen stove. A moment later Seth was all tangled up with the stove and the stovepipe.

THE DOCTOR'S DUTY (Nov. 11).—At the end of a long and tedious day Doctor Strong was just preparing for the relaxation of the evening, when a costermonger burst in upon him, and begged him to come to his dying child. The doctor went with the man to the bitter disappointment of his son, Jackie, who wanted his father to stay and play with him. After his father left, Jackie decided to give his toys a dose of medicine. Accordingly, he abstracted a bottle from the doctor's laboratory, and to show the toys just how it should be done, took a generous spoonful of the medicine. His mother entered at that moment, observed her son's action and looked at the bottle. The dreadful word "Poison" stared up at her. In a frenzy of fear she dispatched a boy for the doctor.

At the moment the boy arrived the doctor was fighting with all his strength for the life of his little patient. A terrible spasm of emotion shook him as he read the note. His son was in danger, dying perhaps. The coster's child would certainly die without his aid. A moment sufficed to show him clearly where his duty lay. He dispatched a hurried note to his wife and remained at the bedside of the poor man's child.

Mrs. Strong called in another doctor and prepared a glass of mustard and water for Jackie. Jackie, however, suddenly and mysteriously disappeared. Shout and hunt as they would for him, it was all in vain. At length, after a long hunt, the almost frenzied mother discovered him in the jam closet eating jam in an endeavor to "take the nasty taste out of his mouth."

The poor man's child passed over the crisis and the doctor hurried home in his car and found the other doctor and his wife engaged in a struggle with the mutinous Jackie, who exhibited an unexpected distaste towards the mustard and water. The doctor seized the bottle from which Jackie had taken the medicine. A great sob of relief burst from his throat, and turning to the doctor and his wife he showed them that he had scratched out the lower label with ink, but had omitted to cross out the poison mark. The medicine Jackie had taken was harmless!

HIS NEPHEW'S SCHEME (Nov. 12).—When John Alden quarreled with his sweetheart, the dashing Widow Smythe, that lady declared stoutly that she was done with him for good. In fulfillment of her declaration, she packed her things that very day and set off for the little village of Bloomford. Although the widow did not know it, John's uncle, Judge Thomas, lived in that same village of Bloomford. For twelve long years the judge had been engaged to Susan Dawns. Those who knew the judge's sterling temperament best declared that they wouldn't be a bit surprised if he married Susan in three or four years more.

The arrival of the widow spelled disaster to their wisehead predictions. The judge met her at the county fair and from the moment his eyes fell upon her, allowed Susan to drift gently from his capable and judicious mind.

Susan promptly replied to her elderly lover's fickleness by suing him for breach of promise. The judge, astonished at her mercenary disposition, communicated with John Alden, who, by the way, was a lawyer, and offered him five hundred dollars to extricate him from his unfortunate position. John came to Bloomford and spread a report abroad that Susan's rich uncle had left her fifty thousand dollars. The eligible male population immediately flocked to Susan's door and overwhelmed her with attention. Gratified at this unexpected popularity, the widow graciously consented to allow the breach of promise proceedings to drop. John unfortunately neglected to advise his uncle of the steps he had taken, and when the judge heard of Susan's wealth, he instantly dropped the widow for his old flame. Susan, however, refused to have anything more to do with him, and eloped with a certain Hiram Jones.

The judge pursued them in an automobile, or rather, a thing which had been an automobile fifteen or twenty years before. Finally it blew up and the judge staggered into the minister's to find that Susan had married Hiram Jones and his nephew had married the widow.

THE PHANTOM SIGNAL (Special—2 parts—Nov. 14).—John Graham, capitalist and railroad president, had the reputation of being a hard man, and for once, popular rumor was not far from right. He was a hard man. Hard in his business and hard in his home. Hard to his friends and harder to his enemies. The employees on his road called him "the old skinflint" and John Graham. hearing the term, smiled grimly and went his grasping way.

The railroad needed new equipment. The tracks were bad, the roadbed was bad, and the cars were bad. Worst of all, only the most meagre sort of precautions were taken for safeguarding the lives of those brought in contact with the road. A discontented, underpaid, overworked force of men slept when they should have been watching and woke to curse the close-fisted tyrant who treated them as mere inhuman cogs.

There were a great many accidents on John Graham's railroad, and after each one there would be much argument as to the proper person on whom to fix the blame. Happily, a scapegoat was always found—a sleeping switchman or a drunken engineer—and the public was content, never dreaming of inquiring into the reason why the engineer was drunk or why the switchman slept.

The Mills of the Gods grind slowly, and it was some time before the soul of John Graham was found waiting with the rest of the chaff for the inexorable pounding of their relentless stones. First it happened that his daughter, coming home from school, was caught in a wreck from which she only escaped at the price of her eyesight. Later, the report came to John Graham that his wife was injured in a wreck and as he sped to her assistance in his automobile, a freight train crashed into it on an unprotected crossing and John Graham was crippled for life. Helpless as he was physically, Graham still sternly refused to grant the needed improvements. Always he sat in his office with glowing, deep-set eyes and brooded over his cherished dividends.

Then at length, one terrible day, the tearful pleading of his wife began to have an effect. He dreamed that the victims of his road passed before him in a pitiful procession, and looked at him with eyes of burning scorn. Their glances seared the very soul of John Graham and he suddenly saw himself as he was. His strong spirit was broken and as John Graham wept, a wonderful light shone on him in his dream, and waked him—the holy light of hope.

GETTING A PATIENT (Nov. 15).—John Maxwell knew he was a doctor because his certificate from the medical school told him so. Otherwise he might have had some doubts. He had an office to be sure, but no patients. Centreville seemed distressingly slow in realizing that John Maxwell, M.D., had actually condescended to settle in its midst. He had been there a week, and the only people who had rung his bell had been bill collectors.

However, John Maxwell, M. D., was an eminently sane and practical young man. Since Centreville did not seem to be aware of his existence, he decided to force the fact gently on Centreville's attention. Accordingly, he formed the habit of tacking a notice to his front door, "Called out on an Emergency Case," and then jumping into his buggy and driving furiously through the streets of the town. After he got out in the country, he would smoke a pipe or two in the woods and then drive slowly home. But even these drastic methods had no effect on the stolid inhabitants of Centreville.

One day, John put the label, "Called to city on Important Case," on the door, and went down to the seashore to vary the monotony of his life. On the beach he walked by a girl lying asleep with the sun shining in her face. On the impulse of the moment, John fixed his umbrella in such a position that it would shade her eyes from the hot glare and strolled on. Some days later, the girl called at his office to return the umbrella, which, fortunately, had his name upon its handle. John and the girl liked each other very much, and decided to see a great deal of each other. Thereafter John continued his tactics of tearing through the streets as before, but the end of his errand of supposed mercy generally found him seated at the side of his fair Marian.

Marian's father, Mr. Freeman, was severely afflicted with gout, and accordingly had what is known as a "temper." Tiring of his regular doctor's methods, he discharged him, and by reason of Marian's machinations, engaged John. Mr. Freeman found that John was a highly satisfactory doctor, and the end of the picture leads us to suppose that Marian will find him a highly satisfactory husband.

ESSANAY.

THE MAN OUTSIDE (Nov. 11).—While Ruth is on a visit of charity to one of the poor quarters of the city she is saved from insult by a young fellow of the slums. Out of gratitude she takes him to her home with the intention of having her father help him. Her father, however, forbids her to have anything to do with him and orders her to send him away. Mr. Remington's secretary, who is Ruth's fiance, comes to her assistance and together they do what they can to help the young fellow. Later, the memory of Ruth's sweetness to him draws young O'Connor to her home. As he looks through a window he sees the butler in the act of robbing the safe in the library, and later when the theft is discovered hears him accuse the secretary. As the police are about to take him away, O'Connor rushes into the room, tells what he has seen, and forces the butler to hand over the money he has stolen. The secretary is released and the butler arrested. Ruth and her fiance are made happy not only at this adjustment of affairs, but also at Mr. Remington's promise to help O'Connor.

THE LAST LAUGH (Nov. 12).—Marguerite discovers a personal in the paper asking for information concerning Wallace Jones, and stating that he is heir to an immense fortune, which she shows to her mother. That morning, when a man applies to Mrs. Joslin for a room in her house and the landlady discovers his valise is marked "W. Jones," both she and her daughter insist on his taking one of their rooms, and make a great fuss over him. Mr. Jones is at a loss to understand their overwhelming attentions, but as Marguerite is extremely pretty, he accepts the fussing goodnaturedly, as far as she is concerned. The mother wants to have things her own way, and after overhearing Marguerite and Mr. Jones planning to elope, she locks daughter in the clothes closet, and donning Margaret's hat, coat and veil, she and Mr. Jones go off and get married. On returning, Mr. Jones learns, to his horror, that he has married the mother instead of the daughter. Mrs. Jones then shows the recently acquired husband the personal, and when he explains that he is not the man referred to, she promptly proceeds to faint. Marguerite enjoys a laugh at the expense of each of them.

THE NEW SCHOOLMARM OF GREEN RIVER (Nov. 13).—Harry Keenan is in love with the pretty young school teacher of Green River, but his attentions disturb her. One day when the man is annoying her beyond all endurance, Fred Church comes to the rescue and sends Keenan about his business. The school teacher and Church immediately fall in love with each other. Some time later Keenan shoots and robs Church. The girl

EXTRA CHAMPION EXTRA

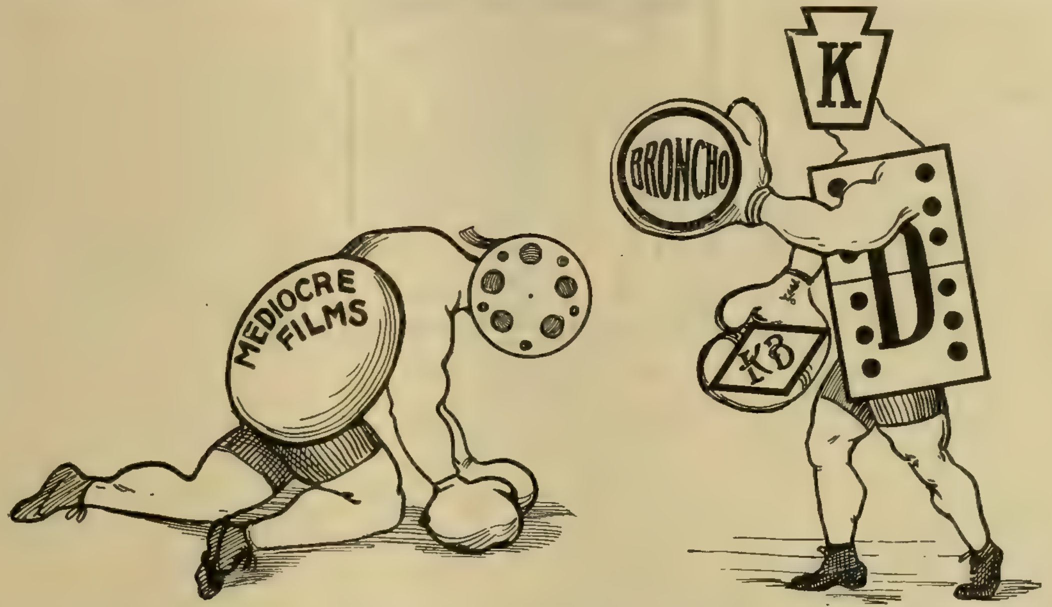
SCORES KNOCKOUT WITH NEW PUNCH (TWO KAY-BEES A WEEK)



The affair between the champion and Mediocre Films could hardly be termed a contest, as the champ just rode rough shod over his competitor. The deadly execution of his new straight right-hand punch (two Kay-Bees a week), the one that Tom Ince has been drilling him on for the past month, was what Mediocre succumbed to in the first round.

In fairness to the champion, it would not be fair to attribute the victory alone to this new punch (two Kay-Bees a week), as his pretty blocking with both hands (Broncho and Kay-Bee), his feinting and jabbing with his left (Broncho), fine headwork (Keystone) and the beautiful condition of his body (Domino) were contributary causes.

Mediocre entered the ring first accompanied by a host of seconds. The champion followed closely, seconded by Tom Ince and Mack Sennett, the famous trainers. Kessel-Baumann, the champ's father, sat close to the ring, ready to act in an advisory capacity. The bout started with Mediocre swinging right and left for the head (Keystone). These were cleverly ducked. He then tried hooking to the body (Domino). Several of these landed, but the champion, being in fine condition, just smiled. Up to this time the champion had made no attempt to land; suddenly he started working fast with his lightning-like left (Broncho), jabbing Mediocre three times without a return, then, still jabbing and feinting fast, he hooked the same hand (Broncho) to the jaw, driving Mediocre to the ropes, and then, working him into the right position, the champion crouched low and drove his now famous straight right-hand punch (two Kay-Bees a week) under where Mediocre's heart ought to be, and the fight was over.

The main bout was preceded by a couple of preliminaries. In one of these a youngster named "Battler Gettysburg," the champ's sparring partner, and another one of Tom Ince's proteges, scored an easy knock-out and showed himself of championship timber.

has arranged to meet her sweetheart at a turn of the Green River road and when he does not appear she goes in search of him. When she comes upon him lying injured in the road, he is just barely able to tell her what has happened. Mounting his horse she goes after his assailant, and forces Keenan, at the point of a gun to carry Church back to town, where she delivers Keenan over to the sheriff.

ALKALI IKE'S AUTO (Nov. 15).—The tortoise may have been slow, but he got there just the same. Alkali thought he had crushed his rival when he asked his fair lady to ride with him in his automobile, but such was not the case. Both Alkali and Mustang Pete loved pretty Sophie Clutts, and the good lady had her hands full in keeping her lovers from shooting each other. One day Alkali called on Sophie with a pair of handsome saddle horses, and asked her to go riding with him. She agreed, but the resourceful Mustang, driving up with a handsome horse and carriage, carried off the lady. Alkali goes to the village inn, inclined to drink himself to death, but finally trades for an old junk automobile, his two perfectly good horses, and clambering in the seat starts in pursuit of his rival and the lady. Overtaking them he has no difficulty in persuading Sophie to ride with him, much to the disgust of Mustang, but the auto breaks down and Alkali, endeavoring to fix it, turns on the juice and the rattle-trap car starts down the trail at lightning speed, leaving Alkali behind. After a thrilling and exciting ride, the car is ditched, and poor Sophie is thrown headlong into the road. She rises in wrath and looks down at the remnants of her new gown and battered hat and waits patiently for Alkali. Alkali and Mustang arrive simultaneously. What Alkali gets is a caution for all would-be joy riders.

THE BOOMERANG (Special—2 parts—Nov. 14).—In the Government offices important plans have been draughted for the building of a certain new type of war aeroplane. At a meeting of the minister of war's cabinet, a part of the plans mysteriously disappear, the thief obviously being one of the four present. A careful search of them all disclose nothing.

Irene, the daughter of the minister of war, in love with Maxwell, her father's secretary, finds out about the matter, and when her father is threatened with being thrown out of office, she sets about the recovery of the plans herself. Meanwhile, it has become known that the part of the plans stolen are absolutely useless without the "key," which was not taken. Realizing that another attempt will be made, Irene, when opportunity presents itself, substitutes blank paper for the key and secretly lays in wait for the thief. He comes, and after a struggle with her, escapes, she following. Her father, with the aid of the police, succeeds in tracing her.

At the conspirators' den she is captured and thrown into a prison room with Maxwell, who is the thief. He has been wounded in the struggle with Irene. Having failed in his work, he has been thrown there to die. Meanwhile her father and the police arrive, just as she finds that Maxwell, the spy, is her lover. The plans are recovered, and all is straightened out when Irene gives her father the "key" which she has kept secreted. She sacrifices all for her father, and the boomerang came back. The man whom she had loved was nothing but a spy—a dual personality.

LUBIN.

THE LOCKED ROOM (Nov. 10).—Albert Rankin, forty years old, a western rancher, marries a girl twenty years his junior. One day Rankin returns home earlier than usual. Mrs. Rankin, who sees from the porch his approach, hurries into the guest room and hurriedly pulls down the shade. Going back to the living room, she locks the door to the guest room and pretends to be reading when Rankin comes in. He takes off his coat and starts for the guest room. Mrs. Rankin bars his way and tells him she will get the coat, that there is something in there she does not wish him to see. Rankin smilingly humors her and Mrs. Rankin gets the coat.

Rankin talks with Jim Brown, who runs one of the village stores. A few minutes later Rankin sees his wife enter Jim's store. He follows and finds her at the jewelry counter, whispering delightedly to Jim. Rankin's jealousy is aroused a little and he suggests to his confused wife that she had better go home. Returning home, Rankin finds Jim leaving his house, and again Mrs. Rankin is unable to explain satisfactorily. At a barn dance that night, Jim dances with Mrs. Rankin, Rankin himself not being able to dance. The rancher's jealousy is roused to a high pitch. Jim and a delegation of cowboys visit the rancher's house the next morning when they are sure Rankin has gone to the fields. They leave one of their number on guard at the porch. In the living room the boys pile their hats on the table and all go into the guest room with Mrs. Rankin. The lookout warns them that Rankin is coming and all the boys rush out the back way, grabbing their hats from the table. Jim is in such a hurry that he forgets his hat. Rankin comes in to find Mrs. Rankin greatly agitated locking the guest room door. He tears the key from Mrs. Rankin, draws his revolver, unlocks the door and rushes within in a towering passion.

In the guest room Rankin finds a handsome loving cup and other presents, purchased at Jim's store, from his wife and the cowboys. Then he remembers it is his birthday. Overcome by the revelation and reaction, Rankin begs his indignant wife to forgive him his unjust suspicions.

A MIRACLE OF LOVE (Nov. 11).—The man with a purpose, who had been falsely accused and convicted, escapes from prison, determined to uncover evidence which will clear him. In his flight he meets the woman without a purpose, who, answering a whim, assists him. The man accomplishes his purpose, but after clearing his name, is haunted by visions of the woman. He returns to her. She is an invalid. Satiated with all things good in life save health, she clings to her illness through sheer ennui—until the man, discerning, with rudeness, tenderness and anger in turn, matches his will against hers. Apparently he loses. But out of the conflict love is born, and at his call the woman, discarding her fancied weakness, walks strong beside the man up the golden road of the future.

THE SEA ETERNAL (Special—2 parts—Nov. 13).—John Tapley, a fisherman; Mary, his wife, and their baby live happily in their cabin on Rory's Point until John Mason, a commission merchant, comes to the Point to buy fish. Mason pays attention to John's wife, who innocently enjoys his company. Corson, the local fish dealer, sees an opportunity of getting Mason into trouble. He succeeds in poisoning John's mind. John thrashes Mason and chases him from the village.

John quarrels with Mary, but cannot but believe her innocent. A little later in spirit of revenge Mason returns while John is absent. He tells Mary that John has been injured and offers to take her to him across the channel. Mary rushes out of the house with him and the two set out in a boat for the opposite shore, Mason intending to keep Mary away from home all night. A storm blows up. Mason is not an adept at handling a boat and it is soon tossing about at the mercy of the waves. John, returning to his cabin, sees the boat off the Point, and prepares to cast a line across its bow. But when he sees who is in the boat rage overcomes him and with the storm raging around him he roars that Mary and her lover can go to damnation together. Throughout the night the storm continues, and in the morning neighbors find John in his cabin, the baby crying in his lap. John's sister, Corson's wife, takes charge of the baby and John leaves Rory's Point.

Years after, Corson's wife having died, John's daughter, Nellie, is made a drudge by the miserly fish dealer, who abuses and half starves her until Ned, his son, growing to love the girl, resents his father's treatment. Corson orders him from the house and he takes Nellie with him. The boy and girl marry and Ned finds work at another fishing village. Crazy Mary, a half-witted woman of the village, who makes a scant living mending nets, takes a strong liking to the young bride. Ever since the night of the storm, when he turned his back to his wife's cry for help, John has wandered the world over, but has never known a moment's peace of mind. Growing old he longs for a sight of the little daughter and returns to Rory's Point. He finds Corson dead. A letter which Ned had written to his father, telling of his marriage to Nellie, gives John a clue to their whereabouts and he starts out to find them. Nellie is ill and calls continually for Ned, who is at sea. Crazy Mary starts out for the fishing banks in a leaky boat to bring Ned to Nellie. The boat begins to fill and sink. The villagers see, but all the men and boats are away, so it looks as though the woman must drown. But John arrives at this time and swims to the rescue. Both are finally brought in

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

unconscious. When John recovers he hears his wife's voice saying, "You did save me, didn't you John?" Crazy Mary is John's wife, who after the storm eighteen years before, had been washed up in a battered boat on the shore of the village. The reunited family is made doubly happy by the addition of a new member, for while John was rescuing Mary, Nellie's baby was born.

WHEN THE CLOCK STOPPED (Nov. 14).—George Bennett, a young real estate operator, opens negotiations for the sale of a factory site to John A. Mann, head of a glass factory. Mann writes Bennett that he will talk about the proposition. Percy Morley, Mann's secretary, forces attentions on Helen Hunter, a stenographer in the office. On the way to see Mann, Bennett sees Morley annoying Helen and protects the girl, finally knocking Morley down. Helen lives near the factory site Bennett is promoting, but she does not know the real estate operator. At Mann's office, Bennett finds the manufacturer willing to buy the site if the property is as represented. Bennett goes home and plans with his wife to buy the property on option, sell it to Mann and thus reap the profit.

He secures a ten-day option, using Mrs. Bennett's bonds as security. Mann orders Morley to inspect the property. The latter goes and there recognizes Bennett as the man who knocked him down. To get even Morley, without making himself known to Bennett, returns to Mann and reports that the site is worthless. Mann telephones Bennett that he will not purchase the property. Bennett is stunned. He makes several fruitless attempts to negotiate further. Finally, on the day the option is to expire, he goes to Mann's office. He is denied audience, but not before Helen has recognized him as her defender. Helen has heard Morley's report on the site and was surprised. Her recognition of Bennett decides her to take a hand. She goes to Mann and tells him the truth about the site. Mann fires Morley and the manufacturer and Helen go to view the property. Meanwhile, Bennett sees ruin when the option expires at 6 o'clock that night. He determines to commit suicide so that his insurance policy of $50,000 will provide for his wife against the loss of her home and bonds; he writes a note to Mrs. Bennett, telling her that at 5 o'clock he will be dead, and gives the note to a boy with instructions to deliver at 5 o'clock. He then locks himself in his office and starts to write a farewell letter. Mann and Helen find the site satisfactory and go to Bennett's office to close the deal. Finding the door locked, they hurry to Bennett's home, where they arrive at 5 o'clock to find Mrs. Bennett reading her husband's suicide note. All rush back to the office. The large clock has stopped at 4.50 Bennett still busy writing does not note for a time that the clock has stopped. Then he looks at his watch to find it is 5.15. Hearing determined knocking on his door, Bennett seizes and raises his revolver to end it all. Mann breaks the glass in the door, opens the lock and disarms Bennett after a short struggle. Before Bennett has recovered from his daze, the manufacturer starts to write a check for the purchase of the new site.

WHOSE IS IT? (Nov. 15).—Pa Dixon goes on the beach for a stroll. Being a flirty old fellow, he smiles at every girl he meets. Much to his disgust Ma Dixon makes him take their daughter, Leola, for a walk. Nell and Bess, two summer girls, thinking no one about, decide to remove their shoes and stockings and go in wading. Seeing a man coming they get frightened, run away, accidentally leaving one of Nell's stockings. Pa and Leola stroll up. Pa looks after the girls and flirts. Leola asks if she may wade. Pa gives his consent. Leola removes her shoes and stockings. In laying them down she unknowingly covers the one left by Nell and goes wading. Pa sits on the beach and tries to pick up a flirtation. Leola returns and tells Pa to come on; she helps him rise, and puts her shoes and stockings, also Nell's, which she does not notice, into Pa's coat pocket. They go home and meet Ma and a lady friend talking. Ma tells Leola to put on her shoes and stockings. Leola takes them from Pa's pocket. In doing so she exposes Nell's stocking. Ma demands an explanation. Pa disclaims all knowledge of it and offers as an alibi Leola. Ma demands he return it to its owner. Pa goes to several lady bathers, but they all disclaim it. Finally Bess and Nell see him coming, stocking in hand; they recognize it, and run to get it. Ma has Pa almost pulverized when a cop saves him. Ma, Nell and Bess argue, ending in a hair-pulling match to the delight of the crowd.

BADLY WANTED (Nov. 15).—A motion picture company is about to leave the studio for locations where scenes are to be made. Among the "props" is a placard showing the portrait of a supposedly notorious forger for whom a reward is offered. Both portrait and description apply to the actor who is cast for the role. Another actor in the company is made up as a typical sheriff. These two, the director, a female character, the cameraman and his assistant leave the studio in an auto. Higgins, a rural constable, being paid by the county on the basis of arrests he makes, has found business very dull, and, as the family larder is running low, his wife hounds him to make an arrest of some kind. The picture company passes his home and the placard is blown out of the machine, falls at the feet of the constable. He goes in search of the crook.

The company stops a little further on and when one of the "props" is missed a search is instituted. The "heavy" goes back along the road. Meanwhile the constable in his search comes upon the company and, exhibiting the placard to the director, asks if he has seen anything of the crook. The director, seeing the possibilities of a practical joke, puts the constable on the "heavy's" trail and tells him that the actor-sheriff will pay the reward if he captures the crook. The "heavy" returns to the company and the production of the picture is continued. While a scene is in progress the constable returns, and failing to recognize the "heavy" as an actor puts him under arrest. There is consternation among the members of the company and the director finds that he himself has become the victim of his own joke when the constable obstinately refuses to surrender his prisoner until the reward is paid. The director refuses to pay and the constable marches the "heavy" to his home and imprisons him in the cellar, setting his wife to keep guard over him. The director, finding his time short and his need for the missing "heavy" imperative, is finally obliged to pay the reward. The constable turns the prisoner over to the sheriff and he and Mrs. Higgins rejoice over their stroke of good business.

SELIG.

MOVIN' PITCHERS (Nov. 11).—The opening scene shows the boys looking and listening at a knot-hole in the high fence surrounding the yard of a moving-picture plant. A flash shows the making of a picture in the yard where the actors are real and the incidents thrilling. The youngsters are bent upon taking a peep and catching the secret of success in a mere glance. Two boys fight for the knot-hole at the fence, while the girls and others climb on the back of a pony and stand looking over into the arena of action.

The Wild West in the yard has grown so realistic that an awkward cowboy bangs into the cameraman and musses things up generally. The director is raving when the cameraman comes on the scene, re-threads his machine, showing the mechanism of it.

Then the scene reverts to the open in the realm of childhood and all the previous scenes are reenacted by the children. "No pent-up Utica is theirs," so they proceed to roam noisily and fiercely over the village, frightening horses and raising much disturbance, finally locating in front of the residence of a man who has the gout, much to that gentleman's discomfiture.

TRYING OUT NO. 707 (Nov. 12).—Convict "No. 707" is a presumably hardened individual, "in" for 25 years, the limit for alleged safe-cracking. The warden of the penitentiary concludes to try the Honor System and allows a party of his prisoners to work in a quarry without an armed guard, placing the responsibility for their return upon one of their own number. Strangely enough, "No. 707" refuses to trust himself to such temptation, preferring to remain under guard. Close to the quarry lives a lone widow, Mrs. Love, and one of these trusted convicts attempts to hide on her premises and get away. But she discovers him and talks to him to such a purpose that he goes back to the pen, repentant.

At a meeting in the prison chapel this convict testifies to the influence the dear old lady had upon him for good. "No. 707," who is at the meeting, appears to recognize his own mother in the description of Mrs. Love and asks permission to join the honor squad, and soon makes his way to her cottage and looks through the window. Behold, the miracle comes true! He sees his mother, who lost trace of him years before his incarceration. However, he keeps his secret to himself, but the following day appeals to the Governor, through the Chaplain, for permission to go on parole and work for wages. This request is granted; he secures work and every week gives his earnings to the Chaplain with instructions that they be secretly turned over to Mrs. Love. The old lady, who is in indigent circumstances, does not know who is helping her, but is only thankful. One day "No. 707" is injured at his work, and the report comes to Mrs. Love that the friend who has been helping her is dying at the hospital. Fortunately the report has been exaggerated. She hurries there and finds her son. In the end he is pardoned, his number is forgotten, he recovers his health and goes back to gladden his mother's home.

THE CHILD OF THE PRAIRIE (Nov. 13).—Fred Watson and his wife Alice attend a dance given on a neighboring ranch. The exertion of the dance is so thirstful that Watson goes out with a friend and irrigates for fair. During his absence Dillon, a gambler, smooth as the cards he deals, engages Alice in conversation and invites her for a stroll. They meet Watson returning and he remonstrates with her in bitterness and at length. A few days later Dillon visits the Watson ranch and persuades Alice to promise to elope with him. Shortly thereafter he encounters Watson and both unlimber artillery and the unfortunate ranchman goes down. The gambler thinking he has killed the husband hurries back to the ranch and persuades Alice to leave with him at once. She insists upon taking her little girl, a child of two, with them. While they are making camp the baby wanders off in the brush and is lost. They make a futile search, and then Dillon, who is now in dread of pursuit, forces the unfortunate mother to go on with him down the now broken trail of her life.

Two ranchmen, the brothers Jordan, hunting stray cattle, find the little one, and after fruitless inquiries adopt it as their own. Fifteen years later, Watson, who escaped death, heartsore and weary after a long, fruitless hunt for his own, happens to hit that range and rescues a young lady at the risk of his life by snatching her from the back of a runaway horse. He is given employment at the ranch of her foster parents. Through some strange whirligig of fate Dillon, who has given up gambling for horse thieving, comes into that corral and Watson suspicions him, but is not sure. He compels Dillon to shave, and this discloses a telltale scar that makes his identification complete. The latter unworthy then tells how he abandoned Alice, who died years ago, and that the child was lost. The Jordans, hearing this, by comparing dates and localities restore their ward to Watson's arms as his daughter. As for Dillon, the all around bad man, he gets his plenty.

A CURE FOR CARELESSNESS (Nov. 14).—Mrs. Wise leaves her rings on the back porch of her house when she goes in to collect the laundry for the washerwoman. Later she misses the baubles and decides that the negress has stolen them. She immediately starts out after the poor washerwoman and meets a series of amusing adventures before she discovers that the woman of color is absolutely innocent.

In the interim, Mrs. Wise's husband, returning home, finds the rings where she had left them. Then resolving to try a sure cure for his wife's carelessness, he places them in his own pocket, so that he can worry her by recrimination for a while longer. When he reaches his office he recounts the anecdote to a friend, showing him the rings and then absentmindedly leaves them all on his own desk. When he reaches home that night he starts in to lecture his wife at table, and to verify the results of his find, reaches into his pocket, and finds the entire lot of diamond rings missing. Without stopping to explain, he rushes back to his office. In the meantime, the alert stenographer finds the rings and promptly carries them to Mrs. Wise. The excited Wise routs out the janitor, dashes into his office, and not finding anything there, accuses the worthy watchman of purloining the jewels. This charge is resented vigorously, and Mr. Wise is considerably mussed up. He then limps on to the home of his stenographer, tries to fasten the accusation upon her, and is indignantly thrown out by her visiting sweetheart. Poor old Wise arrives home sadder and much dilapidated, to find his wife wearing her rings.

HOPE (Special—2 parts—Nov. 3).—The sunshine of Poverty Flat is Hope Anderson, an unsophisticated young girl, who disseminates joy and consolation among the neighbors, and in the darkest hours of her own discouragement she is happy. She lives with her decrepit father, a composer, who ekes out a scanty existence by teaching music. To the neighbors afflicted with poverty, she soothes and elevates their spirits by the songs coming from the harp her father has taught her to play. Although she is successful in ministrations to the poor, fate has decreed for Hope an abundance of trouble. One by one some of the strings of her harp break, and almost simultaneously with the severing of each, bitter disappointments and sorrow fall upon Hope. The breaking of the first string brings disappointment in that she is unable to dispose of her father's latest composition; the second string snaps and with it comes the death of her father, then she loses her lover, whom she had saved from a drunkard's grave, and finally she becomes blind. The young man that had won her heart, Tom Franklin, through his former dissipated habits, is killed by the police. Hope still continues to be a messenger of peace and solace, and many a poverty-stricken home has found pleasure in listening to her songs. She contracts, in her ministrations to the sick, a malignant fever, from which she never recovers. As friends place in her dying hand the harp, the last cord snaps.

PHANTOMS (Special—2 parts—Nov. 10).—Matt Elliott, a young stage manager, won the heart of Natalie Storm, a talented actress. He billed her as a star, and her acting so pleased the audience that she was obliged to go before the curtain many times to acknowledge the prolonged applause. The first moment she got she ran to the office of her beloved to thank him for making her a star. To her bitter disappointment she found that he had left for home to care for his invalid mother. Natalie's love turned to hatred and she wrote a note accusing him of spoiling her greatest triumph in order to satisfy the foolish impulses of an old woman. A realization of her hasty action came to her when she encouraged the attentions of another man, and she wrote asking forgiveness. But the letter was received too late, for his mother had passed away and the wrong his beloved did so affected him that he became firmer in resolution and forgot all about her.

In years the strain began to tell on the physique of Natalie, and her doctor advised her to go abroad. She did not benefit by this change and returned to the scenes of her early youth. She had a feeling as if Matt had been waiting for her, and going immediately to his old home, she discovered that it was only a phantom. She later learned, to her sorrow, that her former lover had long since married, and in peering through the window of his home she saw him, a little older, fondling a baby his wife had just handed him. She goes away with only phantoms of her past to enlighten the gloom of coming age.

KALEM.

THE FATAL SHOT (Special—2 parts—Nov. 3).—Roger and Donald are rivals for Amy's hand. Donald is the victor. Roger vows to get his rival out of the way. Donald's employer gives him a large sum of money to take to the firm where Roger is one of the clerks. Donald delivers the money and gets a receipt for it. The cashier who receives the money dies of heart failure immediately afterward. During the excitement Roger steals the money and later purloins the receipt from Donald's pocket. Roger's firm has no knowledge of having received the money and Donald has no receipt to show that he has delivered it. He is charged with having stolen the cash and is sent to prison for five years. Amy finally marries Roger.

Amy learns her husband's true character. She also discovers the stolen receipt, which Roger has kept. Donald is discharged from prison. He meets Amy by accident and learns of Roger's treachery. The latter overhears the conversation and learns that Donald proposes to break into the house and recover the receipt. Roger hastens home and so arranges the drawer of his dresser in which the paper is hidden that Donald, in opening it, will be shot by a revolver fastened within. Amy learns of the plan, but her husband imprisons her in an outhouse. Donald breaks into the house and commences his search.

Amy escapes from the outhouse and arrives outside the window of Roger's room in time to see Donald about to open the dresser drawer. She fires her revolver to warn the man. Donald starts back in fright. Roger, in the next room, believes his plot has succeeded and rushes into the room. Seeing Donald alive he thinks the shot has gone wild. He rushes to the dresser and pulls the drawer open. A shot rings out and Roger falls with a bullet in his heart.

THE MAN WHO VANISHED (Special—2 parts—Nov. 5).—Hobart's father dies, leaving him his fortune. Regina, Hobart's aunt, learns that her husband will get the fortune should the boy die unmarried. With her husband's assistance she purchases a box of shells and loads them with a deadly explosive. Some of these are placed in Hobart's hunting bag just before he leaves on a shooting trip. His shotgun explodes, injuring Hobart and wrecking his boat. Viola, his sweetheart, hears the explosion and comes to the rescue. She brings him to her home, where a physician orders him kept in bed for several days. The doctor chances to examine one of the shells in Hobart's bag and learns it has been tampered with.

Hobart's butler finds the wrecked boat and the twisted gun. Believing the boy has been killed he notifies Regina and her husband. They take possession of the house. Hobart learns that he has been the victim of foul play. He returns home, after marrying Viola, who has nursed him tenderly. His uncle and aunt are thunderstruck when they learn the boy is alive. By accident, Viola gets possession of the box of shells Regina had left behind in leaving her former home. Regina sees the box and wresting it from Viola's hands, locks her up in the steel vault in the library. She throws the keys of the vault and the shells into the lake. Hobart discovers Viola's predicament. Aid is summoned and the steel door blown open just in time to save the life of the young wife. The guilty couple are confronted with the evidence of their guilt and led away under arrest.

TIGHTWAD'S PRESENT (Nov. 7).—Tightwad realizes it is the anniversary of his marriage, but hates to part with money for a gift. He finally enters a statuary store. By accident, Tightwad breaks an expensive piece of statuary and is forced to pay for it. An idea strikes him. He orders the broken pieces sent home, with the idea of making his wife believe the breakage occurred in transit.

A lady purchases a piece of statuary identical to Tightwad's. The two become mixed and the good statue is delivered to Mrs. Tightwad. She is overjoyed. Later, she learns that she should have received the ruined piece and in her anger makes things hot for her husband.

A messenger delivers a beautiful pearl necklace. Mrs. Tightwad pauses in her tongue-lashing to examine the gift. Believing her husband has given it to her as a surprise, she is remorse-stricken and lavishes affection upon him. Tightwad knows the necklace should have been delivered to a neighbor. He rushes from the house before the mistake is discovered and induces the neighbor to accept a check for the necklace. One mistake was sufficient—he chances no more samples of his wife's displeasure.

THE MARBLE INDUSTRY (Nov. 7).—This is one of the most interesting industrial features ever presented. Marble is seen as it is quarried under ground, after which the process of its preparation for commercial use is shown step by step.

Among the scenes shown is the "turning" or shaping of a forty-ton block of marble into a column. The method of polishing the product forms an interesting picture. Another scene shows men at work sculpturing various figures with compressed air tools. One of these pieces of art is a bas-relief of "The Last Supper," estimated to be worth $10,000.

THE SILENT WARNING (Nov. 8).—Ralph is in love with Raphaello. He incurs the enmity of her uncle, Guiseppe, a saloon keeper. Carlino, Ralph's assistant, is also in love with the girl. Ralph is notified that a shipment of dynamite is due to arrive early the next morning. He decides to take it to the powder magazine himself. The boy and Raphaello are to go to a dance that night, but her uncle compels Raphaello to go with Carlino instead.

Ralph meets the two just as they are starting out. He learns that Carlino is forcing his attentions upon Raphaello and a fight takes place, in which Carlino is worsted. Late that night Raphaello overhears Carlino and Guiseppe plotting to blow up the magazine when Ralph arrives to store the dynamite. The girl's presence is discovered. The conspirators bind her and lock the girl in a room above the saloon.

The girl tries for several hours to free herself of her bonds. A knothole in the floor gives her an idea. She forces one of her braids through the hole. The dangling hair attracts the attention of the men in the saloon and they come to Raphaello's rescue. The girl rides to warn her sweetheart of his peril. The plotters lay a fuse, which they imbed in powder, from the interior magazine to a clump of bushes outside. Ralph, on his way to the magazine with the dynamite, is overtaken by Raphaello and learns of the dastardly plot. Carlino and Guiseppe, while working over the fuse, accidentally touch off the powder. A terrific explosion takes place. When Ralph and his sweetheart dash up to the scene, the conspirators are found buried under a mass of wreckage, the victims of their own plot.

THE RUNAWAY FREIGHT (Special—2 parts—Nov. 10).—Billy, a station hand, and Ruth, a telegraph operator, are sweethearts. Ruth, however, declines to marry the boy because of his small salary. Rand, a freight conductor, is also in love with Ruth. Billy secures a transfer and becomes a brakeman. He is assigned to Rand's train. The freight conductor shows his dislike for the boy. During one of the runs, Rand and Billy engage in a fist fight and the conductor is badly beaten. He vows to get even. Two tramps steal aboard the train. Rand hires them to attack Billy. The latter puts up a smashing fight and is only beaten when one of the tramps hits him with a blackjack. Billy falls dazed and is thrown from the train into a river. The water revives the boy and he swims to shore. He flags a train and is taken back to the station in a serious condition.

Later, Billy's mother persuades him to give up his perilous position. Ruth, believing his resignation due to cowardice, breaks their engagement. Rand brands the boy as a quitter. The conductor receives orders sidetracking his train until the Fast Mail passes. Further up the line, a car breaks loose from a freight and dashes down the hill. Ruth is ordered to stop the Fast Mail, but the warning comes too late. She pleads with Rand to halt the runaway, but the man declines, saying he can do nothing. Billy overhears the conversation. Dashing over to Rand's side-tracked freight, he climbs to the roof of a car. The runaway approaches and Billy leaps aboard it as it flashes by. Crawling to the brakes, the boy claps them on. The runaway car stops just in time to avoid a terrible collision with the Fast Mail. His heroic conduct brings promotion to Billy and with it Ruth's consent to be his wife.

OUR NEW MINISTER (Special—3 parts—Nov. 12).—Lem Ransom, the village drunkard, steals the Widow Huggins' bonds while under the influence of liquor, at the instigation of Hannibal Chapman, an unscrupulous lawyer. After taking the stolen bonds from his catspaw, Chapman treacherously arranges to have suspicion fall upon Lem. The theft is discovered. Darius Startle, the constable, traces the robbery to Lem and arrests him. Chapman secures the man's silence by promising to look after Lem's wife and his daughter Nance, while he is in prison. The drunkard is sentenced to three years at hard labor. Later, Lem learns that Chapman has broken his promise when Nance writes him her mother is dying and that they are in want. Frazier, his cell-mate, comes to his assistance and gives him money to send to Nance. Thaddeus Strong, the new minister, arrives at Hardscrabble.

Strong's doctrines are disapproved of by the narrow-minded deacons of the church. A day or two later, these deacons, of whom Chapman is one, learn that Lem has been released because of good behavior and is coming home. They decide to force him out of the village. Lem finds a champion in Strong. Chapman fosters the ill feeling entertained by the deacons against the new minister, by declaring that he should be ordered to cease his friendship for the ex-convict. The church officials hold a meeting. They decide to visit Strong and make known their objections to the doctrines he is preaching and to his friendship for Lem. Lem is in an adjoining room when the deacons call upon the minister. Lem hears Chapman demand that Strong cease his friendship for him. Upon the minister's refusal, Chapman declares that a meeting will be held by the church officials and that Strong's dismissal will result. Lem bursts into the room and announces his intention of being present at the meeting. Chapman is terrified.

Frazier breaks jail and comes to Hardscrabble. He appeals to Lem for aid. Ransom hides the man in his cellar for the time being. Darius comes to Lem's house in search of the escaped convict. He enters the cellar and is made a prisoner by Frazier, who forces the constable to change clothes with him. Chapman calls to see Lem. The convict escapes in the lawyer's buggy. Several villagers seeing the man dressed in Darius' clothes and riding in Chapman's buggy, fear something has occurred. They hasten to Lem's house, knowing the lawyer has called upon him. Darius, in the cellar, hears the conversation between Chapman and Lem. He learns of the former's guilt. Emerging from his hiding-place, the constable places the man under arrest. The villagers enter and Chapman's rascality is made known.

THE FICKLE FREAK (Nov. 14).—The Bearded Lady loves the Human Pincushion, who in turn loves the fat Circassian lady. In her desire to win the love of the Human Pincushion, the Bearded Lady shaves off her beard to enhance her looks. But, alas! the object of her affections refuses to glance at her. Her troubles are increased when her employer discharges her because she is minus her beard.

The Bearded Lady receives a letter informing her that an uncle has died and has left her all his real estate. Learning of the Bearded Lady's good fortune, the Human Pincushion at once transfers his affections to her. The fat Circassian lady is in despair. The two are just about to be married when another letter comes, which reveals the real estate as being extremely undesirable. The Human Pincushion at once goes back to his first love and marries her. In her anger, the Bearded Lady attempts to stab the fickle freak, but she forgets that he is a human pincushion and her plan utterly fails.

HYPNOTIZING MAMIE (Nov. 14).—Dan loses Mamie's love when he drops a cake of ice on her toes. She drives him from the house.

Professor Svengali, a hypnotist, is in need of a subject. He meets Mamie, who falls in love with his beautiful black hair. The man induces her to work for him.

Dan seeks solace at the theater, that night. To his intense astonishment, he sees Mamie introduced as "Madam Zaza." He rushes home and tells Mamie's mother. They return to the theater and attack the hypnotist. Mamie is brought out of her trance with the aid of a bucket of water, just in time to see that the professor's hair is only a wig. Humiliated, the professor flees, while Mamie begs Dan for forgiveness.

AGAINST DESPERATE ODDS (Nov. 15).—Bob, the sheriff, and Wade, a rancher, are rivals for the hand of Ruth. Bob makes the girl his wife and incurs the hatred of his rival.

The sheriff presents Ruth with an Indian pony. Ruth teaches the animal several amusing tricks. Before long the pony seems to understand his mistress' every command. Mexican horse thieves raid Wade's ranch and steal a herd of horses. The rancher seizes the opportunity to accuse Bob of incompetency. To further show Bob's unfitness for office, Wade has one of his cowboys steal Ruth's trick pony. Ruth sees the man making off with the animal. Bob is away at this time, searching for the horse thieves. Ruth tracks the cowboy on foot. The horse thieves hold the man up and steal his horse and Ruth's pony. The girl overtakes the cowboy and he directs her as to the route taken by the thieves.

Ruth finds the hut occupied by the Mexicans. Entering, she holds them up with her pistol. She calls her pony and he trots up. Ruth places her neckerchief in the pony's mouth and orders him to go home. Bob and his men see Ruth's pony racing toward home and overtake the animal. Ruth's neckerchief warns Bob of his wife's peril and he traces the route taken by the thieves. The Mexicans overpower Ruth just as the sheriff rides up with his men. A desperate battle takes place, in which the horse thieves are captured. The horses stolen from Wade are recovered. Bob and Ruth return them to the rancher. Remerse-stricken, Wade pays the sheriff a substantial reward for the recovery of the animals and asks his forgiveness.

GEORGE KLEINE.

ZUMA, THE GYPSY (Special—2 parts—Nov. 4). —Zuma, a gypsy girl, and a snake charmer, is purchased by a kindly hearted Count and his wife. Zuma drives from the Count's home a woman friend of the Countess who flirts with the Count—and then comes the revelation that the faithful gypsy girl herself nurses an all-consuming love for her master.

At a reception in the Count's home Zuma does her snake dance for the amusement of the guests When the dance is done Zuma turns the fangs of the giant python into her arm—a pathetic victim to her human love for the Count and her dog-like devotion to the Countess.

FOR THE LOVE OF A TOREADOR (Cines—2 parts—Nov. 18).—Lola, a Spanish dancer, meets the famous toreador, Pablo, at a dance hall. Micaele, a Spanish belle, who is at the dance, invites Pablo to call. Paquello, another toreador, is jealous of Pablo, being very much in love with Lola. The two men quarrel at the dance hall and become enemies. Just before the great bull fight, Pablo calls on the pretty dancer, Lola, and she, seeing a rose pulled carelessly through his sash, accuses him of his love for Micaele. Pablo visits Micaele, whose father is keeper of the bulls. He is so pleased with the six fine animals selected especially for him, that he promises Micaele to sacrifice a bull in her honor in the ring. Paquello, hearing of this, calls upon Lola and arouses her jealousy.

The day of the great fight arrives and the two toreadors saunter into the ring under the admiring eyes of the thousands. The fight follows and Pablo succeeds in killing a huge bull, which, amid the plaudits of the multitude, he gallantly offers to Micaele. Suddenly the shouts of the crowd are arrested by the appearance of Lola, who, knife in hand, seeks to stab the smiling Micaele. Leaping forward, Pablo receives the blow intended for her. In the excitement Lola escapes. Several days later the conscience-stricken girl, her anger cooled, goes to the home of Micaele, where Pablo lies injured, to ask his forgiveness. The hot-tempered Spaniard refuses to overlook her action, and tries to drive her from the house. Pleadingly, her hands upraised, Lola falls before a burning holy candle and an instant later the house is aflame. Lola is then arrested and taken away to a merited punishment.

BIOGRAPH.

NO PLACE FOR FATHER (Nov. 10).—"So you're tired of the old town and the old man," said father, and straightway wrote a recommendation to an old friend in the city. It did the work. In the months that followed father was forgotten, until his unexpected visit to see the new wife. His visit was unwelcome. Later, summoned back to his son in trouble, dad saved the day and the thoughtless boy was humbled.

HIS INSPIRATION (Nov. 15).—The artist's depression at the loss of the girl was soon forgotten by his publisher's flattering contract. It was then he felt the influence of his model, who took the place of the other. Married, the couples met again. Blind infatuation led, but what might have been a tragedy was averted by a wise stratagem, the sacrifice of love.

MIXED "NUTS" (Nov. 13).—In her whimsical, peevish way, Mrs. Dimple declared if Mr. Dimple could not pay her bills, she might find a man who would. Of course, she did not mean it, but that made no difference to Mr. Dimple. Romeo-Hamlet, late escaped from the "Nut" Foundry, appeared to convince Mr. Dimple that his wife had found the man. He was done with her. But Juliet-Ophelia made him wake up to the fact that accidents will happen.

MRS. CASEY'S GORILLA (Nov. 13).—Socially ambitious, Mrs. O'Brien concludes to get one over on her rival, Mrs. Casey, and gives a monkey party in honor of Count Castoria. That was Mrs. Casey's cue to do her one better and give a gorilla party. Casey plays the gorilla. It strikes the gorilla that there is too much ardor in Mrs. Casey's tete-a-tete with the hand-kissing count. It starts a panic.

"ACROSS THE CONTINENT"

Picturized in Four Parts from the great play by Oliver Doud Byron

Will unquestionably be the strongest drawing attraction ever shown in a theater. While the play was one of the biggest successes ever launched upon the legitimate stage, the filmed version by the Pilot Co., in 200 snappy scenes, accentuates the dramatic situations and presents settings impossible of depiction on the legitimate stage.

A vivid portrayal of the evils of drink, teaching a great moral.

Wonderfully acted delirium tremens scene, with writhing serpents.

Sensational fall from a high bridge into the surging waters.

A riot of action and physical conflict, as strong men fight and plot against each other.

Reproduction of the famous "FIVE POINTS" of New York, built at enormous expense, which is destroyed by fire. A raging conflagration in which deeds of heroism and daring are shown.

GENERAL FILM COMPANY'S ECLUSIVE PROGRAM

DANIEL (Released on General Film Exclusive Program—2 parts).—In the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, the city of Jerusalem is besieged by Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, and Daniel is brought captive unto Babylon, with Shadrach, Meshac and Abednego, who were of the Children of Israel. And unto Ashpenaz, the master of the eunuchs, the King commands that he should bring unto him from the captives of the prison, certain of the Children of Judah skillful in all wisdom and cunning in knowledge, to whom shall be taught the learning and tongue of the Chaldeans. Among those selected were Daniel, Shadrac, Meshac and, Abednego, who have ten times more understanding and wisdom than all the astrologers and magicians in the king's realm. Daniel has understanding in all visions and dreams, and is the only man in all the land of Chaldea who is able to make known and interpret unto King Nebuchadnezzar the dream which troubles his spirit

Then the King makes Daniel a great man, and his three brethren are made governors over the provinces of Babylon. But when they have risen to favor and Daniel sits in the gate of the king, jealous conspirators plot against the four Children of Israel and they cause the king to set up in Babylon a great, monstrous golden image, which all must worship at the sound of the music, or, on their refusal, they are to be cast into the midst of the burning fiery furnace

On the day when all the princesses, the governors, the captains, the judges, the treasurers, and counsellors, the sheriffs, the rulers of the provinces and all the people are gathered together unto the dedication of the image, Daniel is away upon a mission but Shadrach, Meshac and Abednego stand among the prostrate multitude and will not fall down and worship the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar, the king, had set up The king, in his rage and fury commands the mighty men of his army to bind the three Jews and to cast them into the burning, fiery furnace.

A phantom like form, "like unto the Son of God," appears among the three that are cast in, and they walk in the midst of the fire and the flames harm them not. Then Nebuchadnezzar stands at the mouth of the burning, fiery furnace and calls unto Shadrach Meshac and Abednego that they should come forth, and the king praises their God before all his people

After Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar Darius is King of the Chaldeans and he sets over the kingdom a hundred and twenty princes, and over them three presidents, of whom Daniel is the first. The princes render accounts unto the presidents, Daniel is a faithful servant unto the king, and he watches that the king suffers not any damage from the revenues which are rendered unto him. But the presidents and the princes are angered and they seek to find some fault against Daniel, but no error or fault can they find in him.

But it so happens that near unto the king is a woman of great beauty and charm, and she is favored with the king's love. Unto her the princes go and they do bribe her to cause the king to sign a firm decree that whosoever shall ask a petition of any God or man for thirty days save from the king, shall be cast into the lions' den.

So this woman of great beauty and charm goes to the king when he is at a great banquet and she offers him goblets of fine wine And when the king is overcome with the wine she holds the tablet of the decree before his eyes and he signs it without knowing of its contents.

On the following day Daniel is found on his knees praying to his God and he is brought before the king. The king does not remember that he signed the decree and is sorrowful, and he would deliver Daniel from the princes, but they say unto him that his decree may not be changed, saying unto him, "Know O King, that the law of the Medes and the Persians is, that no decree or statute which the king establisheth, may be changed." Then Daniel is cast into the den of lions. And the lions are fierce and hungry, and when Daniel is thrown into their midst, they growl and show their great teeth, but soon they are quiet and gentle as little kittens, and they look up into Daniel's face with love. Daniel knows that his God has tamed the hungry lions and he lies down in their midst and sleeps.

The next morning the king and all the princes come to the cage, and when the king sees that Daniel is delivered, he is glad and he commands that he should be brought out of the den. Then the king blesses Daniel, but for the men who accused him, he commands that they be cast unto the lions, and when they are cast in the lions devour their flesh and break all their bones in pieces, and the people wonder and tremble at the power of the God of Israel.

Picture Theatres Projected

Philadelphia, Pa.—Work is under way on the erection of a big modern theater for West Philadelphia. ## FEATURES OF MERIT AND THEIR DRAWING POWER

"THE GREAT LURE OF PARIS"

A Drama of Mysterious Power in 3 Parts

A mystery of Parisian cosmopolitan life—where a great Russian scientist, Leonid Protasoff, exerts his superhuman powers on a poor girl, whom he raises to the heights of fame, where she is admired by the multitudes, only later to be dashed into the Abyss.

A Psychological Drama in 3 Parts

"JUSTICE or LOVE?"

was the problem to decide for the coquette Ruth. At the critical moment when the innocent Kirk defending a woman's honor silently accepts a prison sentence, Justice which until then was lying dormant at the bottom of the heart of the coquette, announced itself and decided the question.

"SALVATION"

A Life Drama in 3 Parts

Can there be a greater tragedy in the life of man or woman than when you build and build all your life a family, and when you see that you have almost reached the Goal, and then, as if by a gust of wind, the family, the mainstay of civilization, crumbles away before your eyes? Can there be a greater tragedy? True! In our story the family is partially saved, but the price of Redemption is—a human life.

We want to emphasize the fact that the Acting and Photography are of the highest Quality. We have spared no expense in making our display of posters in all sizes, heralds, photos and slides a Feature in itself.

O! YOU PEARL (Nov. 11).—Pearl White and Chester Barnett have never met, though their fathers are great friends. Chester's father gives Chester a letter of introduction to Pearl's father, hoping to bring about a union between the couple. Chester's overcoat, with the letter, is stolen by the "Lifter." The Lifter decides to make use of the letter and visits Pearl and her father. He introduces himself as Chester, and Pearl, seeing him before he sees her, determines to absolutely refuse to meet him, she not liking his looks. Her father insists on her meeting him, so Pearl disguises as an old maid. The "Lifter" is looking for an escape, when Chester arrives and claims his coat and his name. "The Lifter" jumps out a window into the hands of a policeman while Chester and Pearl are glad that they at last know each other, Pearl having assumed her regular attire.

BALDY BELMONT WINS A PRIZE (Nov. 11).—Baldy is the ice-man. Mike is the butcher. Mathilda is the old maid. She is out swimming and gets a cramp. Baldy and Mike save her, but when they get a look at her face they run. Mathilda inherits a large fortune, and when the ice-man and butcher hear of it, they fall all over themselves trying to win her favor. Mathilda, never having had so much attention paid her at one time, is undecided as to which she will choose. She determines that the men shall run a foot race and the victorious one shall have her hand and fortune. Mike demurs at first, knowing that his great weight is a handicap to him, but at last he consents. The race is run and Baldy wins. Mike at first shows regrets, but when he thinks that Baldy might be able to get rid of her money, but he could never get rid of her face, he is satisfied in defeat.

OUT OF THE GRAVE (Nov. 16).—Mr. Roland is supposedly wealthy. Edith and Walter Douglas are engaged to be married. Mr. Roland dies, and upon investigation, it is found that his estate is insolvent and that his home will have to be sold, leaving Edith penniless. Walter, upon learning of this condition of affairs, breaks the engagement. Edith is forced to seek work. She goes to another city. Frank Barlow sees his girl, Ruth, with another fellow and throws her over. He grieves over it and loses his job. He cannot get another and is despondent. Edith is discharged from the position she obtained as incompetent. Edith and Frank room in the same lodging house, but have never met. Each is about ready to give up the struggle for life and Edith goes to the river to drown herself. Frank sees her and rescues her. She is revived and he takes her home. They tell each other their stories and they determine to fight it out. Frank succeeds in getting work, and having fallen in love with Edith, and she with him, they decide to fight it out together.

THE CRACKSMAN'S REFORMATION (Nov. 14).—Dorothy informs the cracksman that when he has finally renounced his life of thieving he may return to her and claim her. The cracksman resolves to be worthy of her. In his home he doubts his ability to reform and takes out his revolver. A vision of the girl comes to him and he is about to cast it aside when a tray of gleaming jewels crosses his vision. His resolution wavers. He places the gun in his pocket and sallies out.

In the street he comes to a window full of jewels. Turning to the left he observes a window with a crepe upon it. The influence of the girl causes him to enter this house, and he sees a sorrowing couple bending over the bed of a sick child. He ponders, sick at heart, then enters the rich man's house. Stealing behind him he observes the fellow crossing the name of a child worker from his list of wage earners.

At the point of a gun the rich man is forced to the poor man's house and shown the misery which he has caused. Back in his own house the factory owner is made to promise on paper that he will pay his employees a living wage. Underneath this the cracksman signs to the effect that he will return his ill gotten gains to charity.

NESTOR.

LOVE, LUCK AND A PAINT BRUSH (Nov. 14).—Ramona is employed at a department store. Eddie, an artist, is hard up. His pal, Lee, is likewise short of cash. Eddie gets a note from Ramona telling him that he is too cheap to suit her, and all is over between them. Eddie rushes out and bumps into an unfortunate individual, who resents it. In a hurry he placates the old man by giving him his card. Eddie rushes to a telephone and calls Ramona up. She is unforgiving. He bumps into another old man and does more placating with his card. He seeks Ramona, makes up and agrees to take her to dinner that evening.

He borrows Lee's last dollar. Ramona passes up the cheaper restaurants and insists upon Delmonico's. As they enter, Eddie buys a paper. The newsboy runs off with the dollar. Eddie pursues and when he catches the boy, the latter swears he swallowed the money. Ramona finishes her meal alone and parts with her weekly pay check. Eddie, despondent, returns to the studio. The first man Eddie had given a card to, decides life is not worth living. Lee on the street reads of the suicide and that a card found on the man gave the name of Eddie Dauber, artist. He meets Ramona, whose anger turns to sorrow when she hears the news. The following morning, Lee reads that Eddie has won the first prize at the Academy. He goes to the studio and finds Eddie fast asleep.

Connoisseurs call at the studio and ask for the dead "master's" paintings. Eddie goes into an inner room while Lee sells the first one for $2,000. One comes after another. The paintings give out. Eddie paints away for dear life to supply the rushing demand. Finally Ramona comes to seek sympathy from Lee. Eddie gets an idea and paints some forget-me-nots. She takes it home and is foolish enough to kiss it. The paint comes off on her nose. She scents a rat and takes the picture to the police station. A detective goes with her to the studio. The detective asks for a painting. Lee says he thinks there is just one more. The painting is delivered. The detective smears his fingers across the fresh painting and takes Lee into custody. Ramona enters, and so does Eddie, and in her delight at seeing him alive, the detective is dismissed and happiness reigns supreme.

IN THE END (Nov. 12).—After many privations John sends for his wife, Nina, and their little girl to come to his newly made cabin via the next stage coach. She arrives and is met by his friend, Flash Jack, a reckless dare-devil. Nina is at once captivated, and even the child is delighted with his candy and toys.

Flash Jack calls again and again until at last the young wife agrees to go away with him. She insists upon taking the little one. To this Jack objects, but she has her way, and after leaving a note for John, she departs. John returns home unexpectedly, finds the note, hastens after them and overtakes them. Jack's ardor cools somewhat at John's approach, but as the child prevents the angry husband from violence, they are only commanded to leave, while John takes the little one back with him. No sooner has the husband gone, however, than Nina and Jack quarrel. The woman is left to return to her cabin. Instead of finding her husband and child, she finds only four empty walls, for John has taken his things and with the child left for another part of the country. She finds herself deprived of her lover, husband, child and friend.

CAUGHT AT HIS OWN GAME (Nov. 13).—Jack's parents visit the city. The day following their departure Jack receives a letter from his friend, Lowry, saying that Miss West, in search of natural history, intends visiting at the Race place. Jack, fearing that she will not remain if she learns that his parents are away, arranges to have the hired men represent them. Everything goes off fine, except that the girl is rather taken back at the abruptness of the old couple. Tony, disguised as the female cook, however, rebels; Miss West finds him in the back yard smoking. Taking him by the ear she marches him into the house and forces the truth from the other men. The girl plans to get even for the joke. Waiting her chance, she takes money from Frank's cash box and retires to wait developments. Tony observes the cash box and makes off with it. Frank returns home and discovering his loss calls in the sheriff. Tony is captured and brought back with the empty box. Pa and ma return and the truth comes out.

THE BOND THAT BINDS (Nov. 15).—Bella Morris, a dance hall habitue, is the sweetheart of Jim Andrews. Jim meets and becomes engaged to Muriel Henderson. Bella is told that she must not see Jim again. She threatens revenge and follows him to Muriel's house. Here she comes face to face with the girl and warns her to break off with Jim. Muriel, thinking Bella demented, shrinks away and inquires of Jim the meaning of the trouble Later the wedding between Jim and Muriel takes places.

A year passes, Jim and his wife are happy. Bella continues at the dance hall and has apparently forgotten them. Jim, though having promised his wife to abstain from drink, is lured back into the old haunt; he meets Bella and the old flame bursts forth. He drinks and gambles, with the girl at his elbow always. Hours later he is helpless. His companions leave him in charge of the girl. Bella, her opportunity at hand, writes a note to the wife, signs Jim's name and goes to deliver it. The note says that Jim is with the one he loves.

Dawn is breaking. Bella steals to the window; she looks in and then draws back, crushing the note in her hand. Muriel is sick. Jim is aroused from his stupor by Bella and urged to go to his wife. Arriving, he repents and falls at the side of the bed. Muriel, forgiving, turns down the covers and reveals the third member of the family—"The Bond that Binds"—and Jim promises to live straight ever after.

REX.

THE MISSIONARY BOX (Nov. 18).—Robert Marsh, a young minister, takes leave of his mother and departs for the ministry of a small town. Arriving he interferes with the town bully, who insults an old man and his daughter, Mary. Robert soon falls in love with the girl he befriended. One day he again interrupts the bully as he strikes the old man.

Robert finds that most of the people refuse to attend church in tattered clothes. He writes to his mother, calling attention to their urgent needs. She shows the letter to the bishop and together with her society friends they dispatch a missionary box to help Robert. When it arrives most of the contents are found to be old evening dresses, silk hats and other incongruities. The people cannot wear them without being ridiculous. Robert again writes his mother and calls her friends to task for their thoughtlessness, The lesson is taken to heart and sensible clothes sent. The result is that the people flock to hear Robert's sermons, including the bully. Robert, convinced of the worthiness of Mary, proposes to her and is accepted.

THE BLOOD BROTHERHOOD (Nov. 16).—Giovanni, the cashier of a bank, is the leader and evil genius of a black-hand society. From his window in the bank he directs its operations. His confederates come to him with bank books as if to deposit money and in these bank books their messages are exchanges. Giovanni loves Maria, the bank president's daughter, and although his affection is not returned he holds her under a sinister, hypnotic influence. A cripple girl, to whom Maria gives a necklace as a token of friendship, is abducted by the society and held for ransom. The ransom is paid and the girl liberated, but the necklace is stolen.

In the méanwhile there is a run on the bank, and the society informs the bank president that in case the society's money is not paid he will answer for it with his life. Incident to the run the frenzied crowd beat at the doors of the bank and the president is terrified. Giovanni leads Maria and her father from the bank by a rear door and takes them to the country headquarters of the society. Maria sees the necklace which she gave the cripple girl on the neck of an inmate, and she realizes who Giovanni really is. She sends the chauffeur for the police. Maria then falls under the hypnotic influence of Giovanni and a forced wedding is about to take place when the police arrive and arrest Giovanni and the members of his gang.

JOKER.

MIKE AND JAKE AMONG THE CANNIBALS (Nov. 12).—The ship is wrecked. Mike and Jake float on their improvised raft to shore. The king of the cannibals and his hungry people see them coming and lick their "chops" in glee. They reach land, are surrounded and placed in the big kettle while their captors dance around. The king sends for his wives to attend the feast. Queen Lil and the other six wives hurry to the scene where Jake and Mike, in boiling water, are being tested with jabbing forks and spears. Lil takes one look at Mike, says "How beautiful!" and orders him taken out at once. She claims him as her own, and he is led off during the hubbub. Jake escapes. The queen immediately divorces the king and Mike is crowned in his stead. The king is kicked out and Mike has a gorgeous time ordering the cannibals around.

In the meantime Jake has gone for his suitcase, but is taken prisoner by the cannibals. He shows them a fashion book he has, and details his awful plot to dethrone Mike. In the meantime Mike has opened his suitcase and has divided two dresses among the seven wives.

Jake runs on with the fashion book and proves to the angry women how they are being deceived. They are not in the fashion at all, they are merely tit bits as it were. Mike is promptly chased. Jake is likewise chased, but the cannibals succumb to an awful fire of cocoanuts and fall one by one senseless. Then it is that Jake and Mike escape to the shore, get on their raft and sail for the open sea.

ALMOST AN ACTRESS (Nov. 15).—Suzie is stage-struck and scorns Lee's love making, telling him that she is going to be a famous actress. In the meantime, the director of a moving picture company in the vicinity is having his troubles. Struggling with the villain, the leading woman loses her false teeth. Unfortunately, these masticatory implements are broken, and the irate director is minus a heroine.

Suzie has been sent on an errand by her mother. The director spots her, and with true instantaneous ingenuity of his profession, works her into the scene. Benny, Suzie's little brother, has been sent to look for her. He spies his sister in the villain's grasp. Being kicked out when he tries to rescue her, Benny spreads the alarm. The heroine is about to have a narrow escape from burning to

THE MADONNA OF THE SLUMS (2 parts—Nov. 11).—Grace is a member of the Paris Apaches leader, Lloyd. One day, while roaming on the streets, she meets Paul, an impecunious artist. Paul gives her money and becomes interested in her. She returns to the den to be ill-treated, while he goes to his studio to be told by his model that she must have her pay.

Paul sees a vision of Grace with her beautiful face, just the face for his Madonna. Grace, meanwhile, has escaped from the den during a brawl and takes up her place outside of the artist's studio. He finds her there in the morning, and takes her in, with the idea of having her pose. It is not long before an attachment springs up between the two, and Grace experiences the ambition to become good—like the picture that is being painted of her.

New Year's Eve arrives. The artists hold their annual supper. Grace has slipped away and joined Paul at the party in his apartment. Lloyd has followed her with his gang of Apaches.

Grace is wined and dined and proclaimed the model of the year. When the fun is at its highest point, however, there is a wild rush from the outside; the doors are burst open and the Apache band engages the artist in a terrible fight. The arrival of the gendarmes brings it to a sudden ending. Grace's father is shot as he escapes and later dies. The Apaches escape through the Paris sewers, and Paul claims the willing girl for his own.

LASCA (2 parts—Nov. 15).—Lasca lives in the open and loves, with all the intensity of her Castilian blood, Harry, a dashing young cowman. In her jealous rage she wounds him and then takes him under her own care and sacrifices for him, even to the giving of life when it becomes necessary. She has taken him out on the plains. There is one horse between them when the cattle, frightened, stampede. Experience has taught them what to expect; they both mount and make a wild dash to get clear.

Weakened by the wound received at the hands of the girl previously, he falls from the horse. As the cattle rush towards them she throws her body over the prone, unconscious lover. When the man comes to Lasca lays across his body quite still; she has made the sublime sacrifice. He gouges out a grave and lays her to rest. The scene gradually fades out. The man has been telling the story of his own life to his friends and ends by saying:

"And half my heart lies buried there,
In Texas, down by the Rio Grande."

ECLAIR.

LADY BABBIE (3 parts—Nov. 12).—Lord Primton, an honest landowner of the village, who lives with his widowed sister and her fascinating niece, Lady Babbie, resents the exorbitant tax placed upon the people by Governor Dunmore. Under the guise of a lawn party he invites his friends to meet and formulate a plan of opposition. Lieut. Byron, a dashing young officer, is dared by his Colonel to attend this party. He does and falls violently in love with Primton's niece. His attentions to the girl are resented by her fiance and a duel is arranged to take place at midnight at the crossing. Hearing of this and determined to prevent bloodshed, she disguises in male attire and hastens to Byron's room to plead with him not to fight. Here the fiance finds them—the lights are turned out and a terrific sword fight ensues. Byron runs his opponent through. Lady Babbie escapes, but her handkerchief is picked up by a sycophantic suitor.

Meanwhile Primton has dispatched his son to the King seeking assistance. Governor Dunmore plans Primton's destruction. Byron is arrested and sentenced to be hanged. The Governor gives him a chance for his life on the condition that he brings Primton to him alive. Unaware that Primton is the uncle of the girl he loves, he starts in pursuit. After months of weary searching Byron comes to the deserted estate and is entertained by Lady Babbie. She finds him searching the room and accused him of being a spy. It is here that the duel between the man and woman takes place. Byron escapes without doing injury to the girl.

Primton's son returns and the Governor admits his defeat. Byron, who has failed, decides to return, being a man of honor. In the end it is Lady Babbie who saves Byron from death. While in his prison she comes to him with a commission. Astonished and amazed, he tears the folds from her face. She tells him laughingly that tomorrow they are to be married and the story closes with the two wrapped in love's embrace.

UNFORESEEN METAMORPHOSIS (Nov. 16).—Without doubt the cleverest film of drawings ever made. From one dazzling and mystifying transformation to another these drawings jump. A dog becomes a man. A beautiful flower is evolved from George Washington's portrait. There are many little humorous touches interspersed in this reel and the quick exchanges from the ridiculous to the sublime are bound to keep audiences in a continual roar.

Again very many beautiful scenes of New York's waterfront and view of interest throughout the country are flashed, only to resolve themselves into some astonishing shape or form. From the flash of a gun we see a canoe floating peacefully down the water and this disappears to be replaced by a single line, which forms itself into a beautiful prism and then gives way to something equally as startling.

DOES MAX SNORE! (Nov. 16).—The pretty Muriel returns from boarding school. Her mother receives a letter from her god-son, Max, accepting her invitation to visit them and become acquainted with her charming daughter. She is delighted at his coming, when a thought strikes her. She tells her mother she detests men that snore and that if Max indulges in this unmusical practice she will not have anything to do with him. Max arrives and the two young people fall in love with each other.

After luncheon they sit around the table. Max, after repeated efforts to keep awake, falls asleep. Mother and daughter steal away and conceal behind a curtain and intently listen for the first evidence of a snore. Meanwhile Emile, the butler, accidentally drops a tray of dishes and awakens the sleeping young man. Much ashamed of himself, Max arises and goes in search of his fair one. The butler helps himself to the wine and seating himself in a vacant chair affixes a good cigar in his mouth and proceeds to take up the nap where Max left off. He is one of our best little snorers and the sounds which come forth from his nasal organ are both fearful and wonderful. Poor Muriel, hearing them breaks into tears. She and her mother enter the dining-room and much to their astonishment and the poor girl's relief, find Max has an understudy as far as snoring goes. At this point that now wide-awake young man himself enters and the three of them oust the discomfited butler from his comfortable position. Two fond hearts are thus united without the semblance of a snore to break the peaceful calm of lovers' sweet dream.

THE TERRIBLE OUTLAW (Oct. 26).—Following her graduation and her engagement to the college girl's hero, Laura Canton gets stung by the Suffrage scorpion. Thereafter life in or near her presence is one long, loud, over-emphasized song as to the tyranny of man and the spinelessness of woman. Now, while Laura is very pretty, George Bullard, her beau, reaches the limit of his endurance. When gentle persuasion does not succeed in changing her "tune," George writes to say their engagement has been a mistake, and "good-bye." Laura reads this letter at her Suffrage Club, and straightway organizes it into a Bachelor Girls' Club, all the members swearing to ignore men and marriage now and forever.

In the next mail Laura learns that her uncle has died and left her his newspaper and plant at Pawnee, Oklahoma. Laura kisses her girl friends good-bye and sets off to inspect her new possessions. The Pawnee "Times-Democrat" is badly disorganized, its staff being composed of one "compo man" and a printer's devil. Laura elects herself editor and begins to show Pawnee how a real paper should be run. Just as she has run out of news items and ideas, Rustler Dan, the outlaw, a "bold, bad man," runs off after a knifing, and a big reward is posted for his capture. Laura makes big copy out of this in her paper. Then, to test the bravery of her admirers—constituting the entire male population of Pawnee—Laura announces in an "Extry!" that whoever captures the terrible outlaw by sundown, may have the editor's heart and hand.

The cowboys are greatly elated and spend some time in preparation and in guying a newly arrived "tenderfoot." Tenderfoot, unappreciative of his possible danger, dives in and hauls out the terrible outlaw. The outlaw whips off her mask, and is about to ask: "Well, why don't you claim me," when she utters instead a smothered, "Oh, George!" George is quite equal to the situation, and both return to the discomfited cowboys.

THE PASSERBY (2 parts—Nov. 10).—Betty is giving a lawn party. When it is discovered that thirteen are at the table the servant is sent out to bring in a passerby. The wanderer is brought in and seated beside Joe and Klein, two admirers of Betty. Later in the evening Joe proposes to the girl and is refused. Klein watches his chance to force his attentions upon the girl. Maddened that he should be interrupted by the wanderer, and refused by the girl, Klein, the next morning, writes the girl's father that se must pay the note for $1,000 immediately. The wanderer finds this note on the floor.

Klein goes to the squire, instructing him to collect the note. The squire collects his own note first. After a wordy argument with the colonel, he succeeds and is then ordered from the house. The wanderer notes it all and follows the squire. Later we find the wanderer at the tavern, where he is insulted by Klein. Joe enters, and, foolishly jealous of the wanderer, demands to meet him on the dueling grounds.

Late that night the wanderer is seen writing a note enclosing $1.000. The colonel finds it under his door and after attempting an explanation from the wanderer, pays off his overdue note to Klein. Again we find the wanderer and Klein at the tavern. Klein urges the man to play cards. In the game he loses the money just paid. The wanderer turns it over to the squire saying that he is the messenger of another.

Joe and the wanderer face each other for the duel. The wanreder manages to wound the impetuous youth slightly. Betty rushes up, having been warned, and inquires if Joe is badly injured. The wanderer smiles sadly and placing her hand in that of Joe's, tells her that the boy has fought for her and is worthy. He then resumes his journey.

HIS WIFE'S CHILD (2 parts—Nov. 14).—Flo is a child whom circumstances have dealt with hard. Her mother, years before, had deserted her wealthy husband for a profligate, and we find her in filth and poverty, with a husband who ill treats her. John, the husband, had loved his wife, Jane, but he failed to show her the small attentions which one of her nature required. Fox, the dissolute, demands money of Jane. She refuses him, hoping to keep enough by her to feed the girl, Flo. Events contrive to make the man furious with the woman; he kills her and escapes. Flo goes to live with the family upstairs. Here she comes in contact with old Marcus, the Fagin, who schools her in the art of picking pockets. In the park she picks the pocketbook of John's sister. John, unaware that she is the daughter of his unfaithful wife, saves her from the clutches of the law and gives her work in his sister's dressmaking shop. With new surroundings she becomes happy and contented. Charity flowing strong in his heart, John gives the woman-child a little flat.

When Flo is commencing to appreciate the higher and cleaner life, her father appears to threaten her welfare. He finds her out and discloses to John the girl's identity. John is drawn between conflicting emotions on learning that Flo is the daughter of his dead wife. At first he is furious and drives the girl out. But his sister, with the true heart of a woman, stimulates his better nature and he takes the child back, convinced, after all, that he is under obligation to Flo, though she is not his child.

THE MARRIAGE OF NIATANA (Nov. 2).—Niatana, daughter of the chief, graduates at the reservation school with great pomp, Col. Travers, commander of the fort, being present with his family, as well as the members of Niatana's tribe. Niatana is dark, but pretty, and her American dress is becoming. Lieut. Travers, the Colonel's son, is greatly attracted by the girl and is very attentive to her. Swiftwind, a young Indian, who secretly loved Niatana, observed the lieutenant's infatuation.

Travers courts Niatana to the bitter sadness of Swiftwind. Swiftwind discovers Travers passionately embracing and kissing Niatana and brings them before the chief. There Travers, blinded for the moment by his infatuation, asks for Niatana's hand in marriage and the chief grants the request. Col. Travers believes that his son really cares for the Indian girl and gives his consent to the marriage, but his wife is furious, and Grace Markham, who had hoped to marry the lieu-

HENRY SPENCER'S CONFESSION in the REXROAT CASE!!

This moving picture film was produced and photographs taken by special permission of Henry Spencer, the self-confessed slayer of Mrs. Mildred Allison Rexroat and nineteen other victims—leaving a trail of crimes from New York to Chicago—which startled the country in horror and filled the newspapers of the entire civilized world.

CAPTURED AT LAST IN CHICAGO.

This film is educational and affords an excellent opportunity to observe and study the features and manners of this arch-criminal. The pictures show: Spencer in his cell, again outdoors, handcuffed to Sheriff Kuhn of Du Page County; again in lengthy conversation with newspaper reporters, etc., etc. It shows Captain J. J. Halpin, the Chief of the Chicago Detective Bureau, who captured Spencer. He is seen going over, for further evidence, the places where the crimes were committed. Detective Sergeants O'Keefe and Traut, who helped in the capture, are also there. In fact, every phase of interest in the case, every important person connected with the case, are seen in this remarkable film.

NOTE: This Film Teaches a Deep Moral Lesson.
PASSED BY THE CHICAGO BOARD OF CENSORS.

This film is now playing the famous Jones, Linick & Shaeffer houses of Chicago to standing room only. Length of Film near 1000 feet. The photography was produced by Brown & Weigle of Chicago.

tenant, plans revenge. The marriage takes place and Niatana takes up life at the post.

Six months later Travers tires of his bride, drinks, and is brutal to her. At a reception given at their home he abuses Niatana and shows pleasure in the company of Grace, who openly encourages him. Grace plans to discredit Niatana and brand her as a thief. She induces Travers to take her necklace and place it in Niatana's room. This Travers does, but their conversation has been overheard by Swiftwind, who takes the necklace from its hiding-place and denounces Travers and Grace before the assembled company for their perfidy. Travers charges Swiftwind with being the thief and orders his arrest. Swiftwind escapes and conceals himself near the house. Niatana, shamed by her husband's actions, flees to her room and there Travers follows her. Inflamed by drink, he seizes her by the throat and she is saved from serious injury by Swiftwind, who enters through the window. Travers and Swiftwind struggle, the former draws a revolver and in the fight Travers is mortally wounded. Swiftwind and Niatana escape, but are pursued by soldiers. They are overtaken at the top of a steep cliff and Swiftwind tells the pursuers that he and Niatana will leap to death together unless they turn back. Travers, dying, confesses, and his father rides away to save Niatana and Swiftwind. He arrives just in time, but Niatana refuses to return to the fort, preferring to go with Swiftwind back to their people.

THE WARD OF THE SENIOR CLASS (Nov. 4).—They were a happy, care-free little band of girls, the members of the senior class of Mrs. Perkins' Select Seminary for Young Ladies. Many were the little jollifications indulged in by the schoolgirls. The members of the senior class, remembering their responsibility as coming graduates, kept to themselves and maintained a semblance of dignity that was highly amusing to Mrs. Perkins, who had a great sense of humor.

A fudge party was held in one of the girl's rooms, and while on their way to attend it two of the seniors discovered a little girl crouched on the school steps sobbing bitterly. They comforted the little tot and heard a pathetic story of a dead mother and the decision of the village authorities that the child must go to the poorhouse. The child was taken into the house and the senior class held an indignation meeting. The result of it was that next day the little girl was taken to the home of a kind-hearted village woman whom the girls promised to pay for taking care of the child.

The pin money of a girl at boarding-school is quickly spent. The senior class had always succumbed to the few dainties to be obtained by pin money until the responsibility of the child's maintenance was thrust upon them, but they met the situation nobly and gave little thought to the sacrifies they freely made. The parents at home were told that their daughters did not want the jewelry and clothes which they had previously been so eager for, but to send them money instead, and, puzzled by the change in their daughters' desires, they complied with their requests. Thus the girls were able to care for the little waif.

The village trustees accidentally discovered where the child was living and came upon the scene as her numerous guardians were delightedly ministering to it. The idea that girls still in their teens could care for a child was preposterous to the village authorities, who declared that the poorhouse was the proper place for the little girl and demanded that she be surrendered to them. The girls refused and the constable was sent for. He arrived, but before he could wrest the girl from her youthful guardians, the kindly principal, Mrs. Perkins, appeared. She was a person of much influence in the village and when she explained that she would take care of the child the trustees were willing to withdraw.

The principal heard the girl's story and was touched by their generosity. The child made a strong appeal to her, and she gently explained to the girls that they were hardly fit guardians for the little one, and that she had decided to adopt "The Ward of the Senior Class."

LEVINSKY'S HOLIDAY (Nov. 8).—Ike Levinsky, a clothing dealer, takes his little boy, Jakey, to see the circus parade. The boy admires the parade very much and desires to see the show, but the thrifty Ike does not care to pay admission. They manage to elude the circus employees and gain entrance to the grounds, and there Levinsky's troubles begin. Little Jakey is of an inquisitive turn of mind and peers into a tent where several of the feminine members of the circus are gathered. His father is blamed and the canvasmen handle Ike roughly. "The Bearded Lady" leaves her position in a huff, and the owner of the side show, impressed by Ike's luxuriant whiskers, offers him the vacant position. Ike accepts, and for a time is a great success, until in an ill-advised moment he flirts with one of the women patrons and is soundly mauled by her escort in consequence. The spectators are greatly incensed when they discover that the "Bearded Lady" is really a man and deliberate what to do with him. Suddenly they think of the "Hit the Nigger" booth, where an unfortunate colored man dodges baseballs with remarkable agility all day. Ike takes the place of the "Nigger," but his troubles are made far heavier by the business enterprise of his little son, who buys a crate of bad eggs and sells them to patrons of the booth. The eggs are far more popular than baseballs and Jakey reaps a harvest, while father gets the eggs on various parts of his face.

Ike returns home and discovers his son proudly displaying his earnings. He is thunderstruck and inclined to exact punishment when he learns the source of his wealth, but admiration for his son's shrewdness overcomes his anger.

THANHOUSER.

THE WATER CURE (Nov. 2).—The girl lived in a village in the Middle West and had never seen the ocean, or any large sized body of water. She dreamed of it constantly, and was overjoyed when an invitation came from her married sister to spend the summer with her at the seashore. The girl arrived at the seashore, full of joyous anticipations.

One day she went rowing with one of her admirers. Being a simple little inland girl, she did not know that it was wicked and dangerous to rock the boat. As a result of her folly, she and her escort were dumped into the water. A second admirer came along in a sailboat, however, and picked her up, sternly refusing to receive her first admirer, whom he knew was a good swimmer. Ignorance got the girl into trouble again, for she did not know enough to look out for the boom, and admirer No. 2 was too engrossed with her to take heed. Thus, for a second time was she thrown into the water. A swain in a motorboat rescued her this time, but the engine got out of order soon afterward and they were compelled to swim ashore. The girl not knowing how to swim made the trip in a life preserver. When she finally reached land, she decided that home was the place for her.

THE JUNIOR PARTNER (2 parts—Nov. 4).—The old merchant had plenty of money, but did not care for style; his wife more than made up for it, however, as she had social aspirations and dreamed some day of being the mother-in-law of a nobleman. Their daughter was loved by both parents, but her head had been turned by the attentions paid her by a foreign Count who had a wonderful title and an amazing array of creditors.

The father hoped that his daughter would marry his junior partner, a young man with sterling qualities, and one the old merchant relied upon. The junior partner did love the girl, and when her engagement to the foreigner was announced he was brokenhearted.

A year after the girl and her husband had gone abroad the father was forced to believe that all was not well with his daughter. He received numerous letters from her, but each and every one was an appeal for money, and he finally reached the conclusion that clever forgeries had been perpetrated in her name. Too old to undertake the trip abroad to investigate himself, he confided in his junior partner, who gladly accepted the mission.

On arriving in the vicinity of her castle he learned many things that convinced him he should pursue his mission cautiously, so instead of going boldly to the Count and announcing who he was, he lurked about the place in disguise. In this way he was enabled to overhear the Count and a rascal of a physician lay a plot to send the American girl to an asylum as a lunatic. The doctor explained to the Count that it would be necessary for him to have a second physician to certify to the facts in the case, and left the castle to secure this second man. The junior partner promptly followed and waylaid him and so frightened the doctor that he consented to take the junior partner with him as the consulting physician.

In the castle, by a clever trick the junior partner got the girl away from under the very eyes of her watchful husband. Unfortunately for them their auto broke down and the Count and his men overtook them. The fugitives sought refuge in a deserted hut, where for some time the junior partner, who was an expert revolver shot, kept them. Then the Count ordered the place burned, and his menials carried out his orders. The young couple were almost suffocated when the girl discovered a trapdoor leading to a secret passage, which had been built by smugglers, and through it they escaped. Arriving in America the young woman planned to secure an annulment of her marriage, but death carried off the wicked Count before the case could be taken to court. A very short time after she married the man who had always loved her.

LITTLE BROTHER (Nov. 7).—They were the model engaged couple at the summer resort until—well, until they quarreled. They were members of a crabbing party, and May caught the biggest one that had ever been seen at Cape May, but Jack foozled with the landing net and fell overboard. Worse than that, he didn't land May's prize. They argued, and finally the ring was given back by the girl. Both believed that life would never be the same to them again, and perhaps it would not have been, if "little brother" had not wanted a velocipede.

"Little brother" was regarded by his sister as a dear, and by Sis's sweetheart as a nuisance. But he offered to square things if Jack would give him funds to buy the velocipede, and Jack eagerly accepted.

If you saw the man you love rush widly into the foaming sea, would or would you not call him back? May did, for she called Jack back, and they were happy ever afterward. He did not deceive her at that—even though he had no intention of committing suicide. Jack later rewarded "little brother," who bought his bicycle and proudly rode it. Jack's reason for paying up was not entirely gratitude. He figured that a boy who could make one suffer so exceedingly while doing a favor, was a person who might rise to remarkable heights if he tried to be an avenger. So "little brother" got his velocipede, and May and Jack got married.

MARTHA'S DECISION (Nov. 10).—Martha Bradley and John Freeman were playmates and childhood lovers. Early in life Martha lost her father, and, at the age of sixteen, the death of her mother leaves Martha an orphan. The country seems lonesome and dreary to her, so she secures a position in town. By diligent application to her duties she soon rises to become the private secretary of the head of the firm.

Her employer's interest ripens into love and he proposes to her. This was not what she anticipated and it arouses her to deep thought and retrospection. She realizes that she does not love her employer. She asks for time to consider and that night in her room she has visions of her old home, her old-time playmate, John and her employer. She writes the latter that she cannot wed him, as she does not love him and then returns to her old home. Here she finds that her absence has not caused John to forget. The meeting is an agreeable surprise to the erstwhile playmate and Martha decides to stay and reciprocate the unfailing love for her devoted and constant John Freeman.

AN ASSISTED PROPOSAL (Nov. 13).—Ellen sends out invitations for a mask dance. Joe, after securing some masks, lets Kate know what his costume is to be. It happens that Joe is called away to attend to some business and he writes a note to Kate that he will try to return in time for the dance. Jim promises to deliver this note, but changes his mind, knowing that Joe has made several unsuccessful attempts to propose to Kate. Jim decides to go to the dance in Joe's place, wearing Joe's costume and mask. At the dance Jim proposes to Kate and she accepts, thinking the man behind the mask is Joe.

Joe, returning from his business trip on the night of the party, finds his costume gone. He hurries to the dance and makes Jim give it to him. Joe puts on his mask and costume and when Kate appears he is embarrassed by her affectionate actions. Jim, in the meantime, has brought a minister to the house. Just before they arrive Kate has asked Joe: "When shall we be married?" Joe, thunderstruck, tries to get away from the crowd who have overheard Kate's remark. The cowboys hold Joe and the minister performs the ceremony. Jim and the boys then explain to Joe how it all happened.

THE DRUMMER'S HONEYMOON (Nov. 15).—The wedding is over and Mr. and Mrs. Harry Sellgood stop at the office where Harry is employed as a traveling salesman to bid farewell before leaving on their honeymoon. Scarcely have they departed when another salesman reports by telephone that Mr. Beyer, the purchasing agent of Beyer & Sexton, has left for an extended vacation at Oceanside, Cal. A telegram is dispatched to Harry to stop over at Oceanside and secure an order at any cost. When Mr. Beyer arrives at Oceanside he leaves positive instructions at the hotel that he is not to be bothered on matters of business.

Harry Sellgood bribes the bellboy to deliver his card to Mr. Beyer, who at first is considerably exercised over the infraction of his order, has the bellboy bring the gardener of the place to his room. This individual is pressed into service to impersonate Mr. Beyer, and allow himself to be wined and dined. While this little entertainment is being carried out Mr. Beyer proceeds to have a good time, which involves the innocent companionship of one of the lady guests at the same hotel. While thus engaged he encounters Mrs. Sellgood, who enjoys a personal acquaintance through her father's business connection.

Later the young bride meets her hisband hopelessly endeavoring to convince the substitute Mr. Beyer that he ought to place an arder and explains to him the man is an impostor. Harry calls the police to arrest the man, but Mr. Beyer comes to the rescue and the police are called off. Mrs. Sellgood now graciously smiles on Mr. Beyer, and with an open order book in hand readily induces him to authorize a ridiculously large purchase of supplies.

Harry and his wife are highly elated over the little escapade and wire the office the result of the stop-over—a $15,000 order—some easy picking.

he enters a lumber yard to get shelter from the wind. Two tramps jump on him from behind a pile of lumber, and take his clothing, leaving him their ragged suits. A policeman comes along and chases Bond, thinking he is an ordinary tramp. His ship has already sailed and he is driven from the dock. He meets another tramp, Steve, and the two become friends.

The other tramps, Red and Pete, who attacked Bond, then proceed to his home with the intention of robbing it. They flash Bond's cards on all sides, and as a result receive instant and respectful attention from everybody. Red and Pete gain entrance into Bond's house through a window, when the man and maid servant are out. They are surprised at their work by Bond and Steve, who have entered in the same way, and a struggle ensues, during which the complaint of Pete, who is impersonating Bond, and, being well dressed, his story is believed. The appearance of the butler, who finally recognizes his master, saves Bond from an embarrassing position, and the real culprits receive their just deserts.

THE DRESS OF LOLITA (Nov. 5).—Lolita and Beto come to America from sunny Italy After being admitted to the new world by way of Ellis Island, they take up their quarters in that part of New York known as "Little Italy." They have a hard struggle Beto cannot get work and Lolita becomes ill As a last resort to secure medicine for Lolita, Beto pawns his beloved mandolin. Lolita recovers, but the struggle to get employment still goes on.

An Italian fete day comes around and Lolita is downcast because she has no gift to give her husband. After he has gone out a brilliant idea comes to her. She calls in Lucia, the belle of the Italian quarter, and offers to sell her wedding dress. Lucia buys it. Lolita takes the money Lucia gave her and with it redeems the mandolin. This will be her present to Beto. That afternoon Lucia goes forth for a walk with one of her admirers, wearing her newly bought dress.

As Lucia is walking along with her escort, Beto sees her, and recognizing the dress as his wife's wedding dress, thinks his Lolita is walking out with another man. Filled with rage and jealousy he follows them for a distance, but loses them in the crowd. He returns to his home and tells Lolita to put on her best dress. She does not want him to know of her sacrifice, and therefore shrinks from him. He thinks that she is afraid because she is guilty and reaches for his stiletto. Lolita faints. The loungers in the hall below hear the commotion in the room above and rush up. As they enter Beto looks up and sees the dress on Lucia, who explains how she came by it. He thinks he has killed his wife and is filled with remorse. His foot touches the mandolin as it rests against the couch. Picking it up he reads from a card attached to it that it is Lolita's gift to her husband. At this his remorse is doubled. Lolita revives and Beto, almost insane with joy, catches her to his heart, and implores her forgiveness.

DOMINO.

THE GHOST (2 parts—Nov. 13).—Tim O'Grath loves his drink, so much so in fact that when he goes to market and sells his pigs, he stops at the tavern and spends the money instead of taking it to his landlord. Tim is taken home by Father Daley. They put Tim to bed and he enters the "land where things are not what they seem and phantoms lurk within whiskey dreams." St. Patrick appears to him and tells him that he shall roam the earth in spirit until he kisses the sacred cross of Father Daley and promises to drink no more. St. Patrick leaves him and Tim sees himself prepared for burial and the neighbors are holding a wake. He goes into the room, but is not seen by the mourners. Tim wanders out into the street, but is not seen by his friends, and he hears everyone talking of the sad death of Tim O'Grath. He meets the same fate at the tavern and at last takes refuge in the church, where he finds the cross and kisses it, only to wake and find himself kissing the pillow. He firmly resolves to drink no more, throws the bottle into the street, which almost strikes Bridget and Father Daley. Bridget is struck almost dumb with astonishment to see Tim throwing good whiskey away. Thinking he has the delirium tremens, she rushes into the house to find Tim only too ready to kiss the cross of Father Daley and sign the pledge forever.

BRONCHO.

THE IMPOSTOR (2 parts—Nov. 12).—Jim Owens, a sergeant in the Union army, finds the body of a dead Confederate, whose resemblance to himself is so great that he is startled. He makes an examination of the man's clothes and finds a letter addressed to John Calhoun, 7th Regiment, Virginia Volunteers. The letter is from the man's mother, telling him that her world is very narrow now that she has lost her eyesight. Never having known a mother's love, Owens decides to impersonate Calhoun, feeling that the mother will not recognize that he is not her son, now that she is blind. He studies the handwriting of the letter Calhoun had started when he was called to battle, copies it and writes to the mother, telling her he is safe. Owens is detailed to carry important despatches through the Confederate lines to General Butler, and is captured by the Confederates. He makes the explanation that he belongs to the 7th Regiment, Virginia Volunteers, and that he has been a prisoner in the Northern prison, and that he escaped by taking the clothes from the messenger who bore the despatches. So great is the resemblance to Calhoun that the captain, when called, identifies him. Having been wounded, Calhoun is sent home on furlough. Again he passes close inspection and is welcomed by Mrs. Calhoun and her daughter, Betty. Owens finds himself falling in love with Betty and tells her the story. She begs him to keep up the deception as her mother is very low. Mrs. Calhoun dies and Owens, leaving a confession for Betty to give to her lawyer, starts to leave. Betty finds him and begs him to take her with him, as she knows a wicked man would not have confessed, and she has learned to love him.

Tom is denounced as a bogus hero and after being thrown out of the house, his conniving old parents are ordered to follow him forthwith.

FEATURES

WHAT EIGHTY MILLION WOMEN WANT (Feature Subject—Four parts).—Travers, a young lawyer and sweetheart of a suffragette, tries his first case (an accident case) brought against a benchman by the boss. He learns that the boss' power extends even to the court house, for he makes good his promise that the case will be dismissed.

However, shortly thereafter, the lawyer, unbeknown to his sweetheart, accepts a retainer from Kelly, the boss. Later through the stupidity of the lawyer's stenographer in putting wrong inclosures in letters the suffragette learns of her sweetheart's duplicity. With a feeling of repugnance at his lack of manhood she breaks her engagement. The lawyer's better nature asserts itself, and he determines to enter the political fight then pending for good government in opposition to the boss. A violent quarrel ensues between the boss and the lawyer. Not long after the quarrel the boss is injured by the man whose case had been previously dismissed, and the young lawyer is locked up charged with the crime. His sweetheart and the Women's Political Union come to his assistance and by a clever piece of detective work they discover to the boss' chagrin who is the real culprit and cause his arrest and the release of the lawyer.

The primary elections are near and the boss in desperation determines to steal the election by voting a lot of repeaters. He hires and pays these men and the evidence thereof comes into the possession of the suffragettes. It leads to the arrest of the boss and he finds that his "pull" availed him of nothing. The Women's Political Union has triumphed in the election. The scene ends with the lovers being reunited, kissing behind a wedding license. The sub-title calls the wedding license "The Winning Ballot" or "The Most Popular Ballot." Is marriage "WHAT EIGHTY MILLION WOMEN WANT?"—or is the right of suffrage "WHAT EIGHTY MILLION WOMEN WANT?"

"THE SHAME OF THE EMPIRE STATE"

with GOV. WM. SULZER, Himself, GENUINE, PERSONALLY!

AND HERE ARE THE DETAILS:

The biggest moving picture interests in the world offered fabulous sums for the services of this man who for another year will be the central figure in the Nation's politics; his fate is the most absorbing topic in the country's affairs; his series of one hundred lectures will keep his name on the first page of every newspaper in the country, and his exposures of political corruption, even as electrifying as they are now, are only a small part of the story he is yet to tell.

This picture is the only one for which his services have been secured. It is a four-reel production which tells for the first time a side of Sulzer's story never yet made public.

There is plenty of thrill and romance in it, and even if so sensational a figure as an impeached governor of the first state in our country were not in it, the story is still a powerful feature.

BUT HE IS! Not a fake, not an impersonation, but the real, living Mr. Sulzer himself. We know it sounds too big to be true, but we always have dealt in big ones—if you are sceptical, ask anyone who knows us.

The film is four reels, with a number of fights and riots and scraps and enough wallop to make you sit up. The paper is strong and full of ginger—leave that to us; you will throw your hat in the air with joy when you see it. Yes, Sulzer is on it, too!

This is a special release. If you are wide awake you will secure it in a jiffy.

What territory, please?

MR. EXHIBITOR, READ THIS

"The Battle of Gettysburg" played Tuesday, October 14th, at La Ray Theatre, Salem, N. J. Mr. Ray, when asked how it took, said:

> "We could not hold the crowds. The biggest mob that ever attempted to get into a theatre fought to see it. We turned away as many as we took in. This is all the more remarkable, when we are charging 10c., as it was the first time we have ever gone above a 5c. admission. In addition to this fact, on the same day there was a big launching at Salem and a free lecture at the City Hall. Naturally, we were more than delighted with the result."

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and anyone can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact, they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of $3.50 we will send, by parcel post, prepaid and insured, the following: 24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address:

Now is the Time of Year to Commence

SYSTEM

If you are not putting system in your business now you never will. Five years ago I discovered that [illegible] of Exhibitors had no auditing system much less bookkeeping records. That prompted me to publish now that [illegible] are using a SYSTEM whereby they KNOW at the end of each week every cent received, what became of each ticket, where the money went, its expenses separating every single item of it. Even recording the weather, besides films and vaudeville.

The Theatre Record Ledger System

I WILL DO THE SAME FOR YOU

Send me $2.50 (plus 20 cents postage), and I will mail you a THEATER RECORD LEDGER SYSTEM with the understanding that if my SYSTEM is not far superior to the one you are now using your money will be refunded.

FLORENCE ROBERTS Will Appear All Over the East in Vaudeville to Help Make Her "SAPHO" Popular For You

Did you know that Florence Roberts, star of our six-reel "SAPHO," is headlining over the great United circuit of big Eastern vaudeville theatres, to help MAKE THAT "SAPHO" FILM MORE POPULAR THAN EVER? She will positively appear in the famous Keith vaudeville theatres AT THE SAME TIME THAT HER "SAPHO" IS SHOWING IN THE PICTURE THEATRES. Now here's a bright idea: Ascertain when the big variety house in your town or neighborhood has Miss Roberts as headliner and

Book "FLORENCE ROBERTS IN 'SAPHO'" Sometime in the Same Week—or for the FULL WEEK If You've Got a Large House!

"SAPHO" is still causing lots of excitement and getting lots of money everywhere it's shown. There was never a more talked-of picture. "SAPHO" as a clean production is something of which the old-time stage producers never dreamed. This "SAPHO" is a success because of its tremendous lesson, NOT ITS "SPICE." You see the Bad Woman, Sapho, in a new light, and the young lover, Jean, so too. In fact, we feel that Miss Roberts has presented "SAPHO" exactly as its author wished it to be presented and as his manner of dedicating it —to his own sons—implied.

SPEAKING OF OUR REGULAR RELEASES

there's "THE MARRIAGE OF NIATANA," released Sunday, Nov. 2nd, that's a really new kind of Indian story No mere "chase" and shooting without a plot to back it up. "THE WARD OF THE SENIOR CLASS," released Tuesday, Nov. 4th, is a touching, interesting story of school life, and "LEVINSKY'S HOLIDAY," released Saturday, Nov. 8th, is the kind of comedy you shout about and for.

Remember that all these reels feature the new Majestic Favorites and that there are no favorites like New Majestic Favorites!

Royal October, the Month of Harvest, of First Fruitage, of Splendid Autumnal Tinting, Appropriately Offers a Line of Selig Polyscopic Plays Varied in Interest, Vivid in Portrayal, Picturesque in Environment.

"PHANTOMS"

This is a gripping and surprising play, changing from the very acme of excitement and joy to fiery hate and then to sullen, gray hostility on the part of a temperamental actress who loses her fiancé through her own foolish impulsiveness, and spends an unhappy life, only cheered by the phantoms of the past. It is an unusually strong play and is interesting in a series of dissolves, making the psychological values very telling.

IN TWO REELS. RELEASED NOVEMBER 10TH

November 11th "MOVIN' PITCHERS"

The ready response of youth to imitate its elders in everything naturally leads to an effort at duplicating the mighty magic of moving pictures. This makes a very jolly, lively and wholesome comedy, genuinely humorous in its manifold movement.

November 12th "TRYING OUT NO. 707"

This is a pathetic story of the Honor System, which allows inmates of the penitentiary the liberty of the open, instead of an eternity of stone walls. "No. 707" aids his poor old mother, and wins his way to freedom.

November 13th "THE CHILD OF THE PRAIRIE"

A good, red-blooded romance of the West, in which a weak woman yields to a smooth gambler, but her child eventually comes to find the father she had lost in the long ago.

November 14th "A CURE FOR CARELESSNESS"

An everyday story of unusual interest, involving a housewife who carelessly lays aside her rings, which are picked up by her husband, who in turn loses them and tries to reprove her, and is rebuked for his own weakness. Eventually the "cure" works out to the good of the family.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR

(After the poem by Henry W. Longfellow)

In Longfellow's beautiful poem he tells of the children's hour, that time in the day when the little ones are permitted to meet their elders on equal ground. He describes the love that existed between the grandfather and his three little grandchildren, who each night insisted upon coming into his study, where for one golden hour they reigned supreme, and he was their willing and devoted servant.

OUR New York office has been throbbing with exciting events ever since the announcement of our enormous $250,000 national advertising campaign. Some great big things have been happening, and we will tell you about them as soon as possible. Meanwhile Universal exchanges and exhibitors are the happiest people in the world, not only on account of our great advertising campaign but because of the superb quality of all our recent releases.

A Few Brief Extracts from Enthusiastic

California Film Exchange:—"We congratulate you for starting this campaign. It will greatly benefit all Universal exhibitors."

Interstate Films Co., Philadelphia:—"We cannot say too much in praise of your efforts. It is a great idea."

Laemmle Film Service, Chicago:—It keeps us guessing what wonderful thing you will do next. You work and scheme and do things while others snooze. Congratulations."

Standard Film Exchange, Chicago:—"The quality of Universal films is now so good that you can well afford to enter strongest kind of advertising campaign. The goods will more than back up your ads."

Cincinnati Buckeye Film Exchange:—"It's immense. Congratulations!"

Wm. H. Swanson Film Co., Denver:—"It will unquestionably create world-wide demand for Universal films and benefit all Universal exhibitors."

Canadian Film Exchange, Toronto:—"Biggest thing ever pulled off."

Detroit Universal Film Co.:—"A glorious thing. Universal quality leads them all."

Universal Film & Supply Co., Kansas City:—"This stupendous appropriation most astounding advance step ever taken by any film concern."

Canadian Film Exchange, Montreal:—"Not surprised. It is the Universal's method always to be in front."

"Congratulations on Capt. Kidd" are pouring in. The first telegram came from the Central Film Service Co., of Indianapolis, saying:—"Just ran off Capt. Kidd. Heartiest congratulations. Most wonderful picture have ever seen." Others of similar character have been coming in constantly. If you have not seen Capt. Kidd you have missed a feature that is simply marvelous. ## Telegrams Received from Exchanges

Victor Film Service, Cleveland:—"Will be a great thing for exhibitors. Hearty congratulations."

Washington Film Exchange, Washington, D. C.:—"Can't find words to properly voice praise due to Universal program and Universal progress. This is a one-horse race. You can't lose."

Film Supply Co. of Oregon:—"Without doubt one of the greatest things any film company has ever seen fit to do."

Consolidated Film & Supply Co., New Orleans:—"Not only shows your originality and aggressiveness, but proves your keen appreciation and consideration of Universal exhibitors first, last and all the time."

Universal Film & Supply Co., St. Louis:—"Congratulations. Real pleasure to be associated with live, progressive firm that looks to its patrons' interests rather than dividends."

Victor Film Service, Buffalo:—"Hope your new plan will meet with the great success you deserve."

Consolidated Film & Supply Co., Dallas, Tex.:—"No film maker in the world has taken such wonderful strides in bettering moving picture industry. Universal now by far the best."

Laemmle Film Service, Minneapolis:—"Exhibitors receiving news with great enthusiasm. Congratulations."

"Congratulations on Joker Films" have been coming in ever since the first release of this new brand. ## The Escape of Jim Dolan

Selig. Two Reels. Released November 17th.

Jim Dolan, an ideal type of cowboy, arouses the hatred of Ed Jones, foreman of the Brown Ranch, because of his attentions to pretty Grace Wellington.

Brown, whose ranch surrounds the little "claim" of Dolan, rides in with his foreman one day, and demands that Dolan sell out to him. He refuses and Jones butts in, only to be quickly silenced. This clinches Jones' hatred for Dolan, and he frames up a case of "missing cattle" so that suspicion points to Dolan.

Dolan is convicted of the crime and sentenced to ten years in the penitentiary.

Through the clever assistance of Grace, he makes a thrilling getaway, only to be captured later by Apaches, who proceed to torture him. Rescued by a prospector, he learns later in his mountain refuge that Jones, wounded in a saloon fight, has confessed his crime. Jim Dolan returns to the game of life for good, and Grace Wellington becomes his chiefest treasure.

For the Love of a Toreador

Kleine-Cines. Two Reels. Released November 18th.

Lola, a Spanish dancer, in love with Pablo, a Toreador, becomes insanely jealous of Micaele, daughter of a wealthy keeper of bulls, and a belle of society.

Learning that Pablo has promised to sacrifice a bull in honor of Micaele, she nurses her rage until the day of the big fight.

Pablo succeeds in killing a huge bull, which, amid the plaudits of the multitude, he offers to Micaele. As he does so, Lola rushes in with dagger drawn and aims a blow at her rival. Pablo, quickly stepping between them, receives the dagger thrust, and Lola escapes.

Returning conscience-stricken, she pleads forgiveness from her wounded lover, but is repulsed. Pleadingly, her hands upraised, she falls before a burning holy candle and an instant later the house is aflame. Lola is then arrested and taken away to a merited punishment.

The Express Car Mystery

Kalem. Two Reels. Released November 19th.

Dugan, a loafer, smashes Pasquali's violin. The Italian vows to get even. Dugan learns that Grant, an express messenger, has received a large sum of money to transport to a distant bank. He drops from a bridge to the roof of the train as it passes and, climbing into the express car, knocks Grant unconscious and escapes with the money.

Grant is accused of theft and arrested. Pasquali sees Dugan passing and follows him to his house. He enters the man's room and a struggle ensues. Dugan lays the Italian low, and escapes as a lamp is upset and starts a fire.

Pasquali revives and makes his way out. Dugan boards a passing train and leaves town, but the Italian follows him still. Dugan is captured and brought back to the city, where at length he confesses his crime, and Grant is freed.

The Green-Eyed Monster of Jealousy

Patheplay. Two Reels. Released November 20th.

Mrs. Denagel's daughter, Jacqueline, lives at a boarding school since her mother's second marriage. Mr. Denagel has taken an aversion to the child from no cause whatever, and when she returns unexpectedly from school because of an outbreak of measles there, his irritation is increased. When Jacqueline, while at play, upsets an inkwell on his papers and breaks a valuable vase, his resentment openly breaks out. The grief of the sensitive child cuts him to the quick, and he endeavors to make amends. From that time on they are fast friends. The mother foolishly becomes jealous and takes the child away in a fit of anger. The way in which Jacqueline brings stepfather and mother together and forms a common bond between the two is shown in a very touching way.

Partners in Crime

Lubin. Two Reels. Released November 20th.

Frank Dolby, a young newspaper reporter, becoming interested in a chain of burglaries, gets permission from his editor to run down the band of crooks.

Engaging the help of Andrews, a young detective, they start on their thief hunt. Frank is captured by the crooks, but is rescued in the nick of time by Esther Jansen, his fiancee. Some of the crooks are caught, and to Frank's horror his father is a leader among them. Frank tries to help him escape without revealing his identity, but is unsuccessful.

Jansen tries to prevent the marriage of his daughter to Frank, who notifies his father in jail. Dolby decides to escape and confront Jansen, who Frank learns is his father's old partner in crime and the other leader of the crooks.

Frank undertakes to capture the rest of the band, and, through a mistake of Jansen, is in danger of being shot when Jansen sacrifices his own life to rescue him. When Frank returns to his home he finds his own father dying.

The End of the Circle

Essanay. Two Reels. Released November 21st.

During the early days of the West, Will Davis, a prospector, landed in a small town. A Mexican girl, Juanita, becomes interested in Davis. Tom Wilson, a ranchman, loves Juanita, but bestows his attentions on a beautiful young miss, Eileen Sheridan. Davis meets Miss Sheridan and becomes infatuated. The young prospector proposes and is accepted. Tom and Juanita, however, swear revenge when they hear of the engagement. Wilson gets Juanita to go and see Davis, and then leads Eileen to the cabin, where she sees Juanita with her sweetheart.

For spite Eileen marries Tom Wilson. Later Eileen, Tom Wilson and their daughter pitch camp by the roadside and are nearing starvation. Wilson unhitches the horses and rides to town for food, but spends the money on whiskey. Eileen, fearing she will die, sends her young daughter in search of her father. Wilson in a drunken stupor falls over a cliff and is killed. Davis, camping nearby, discovers his old rival, and upon climbing to the top of the cliff, saves Wilson's child from a bear. Davis carries the child to camp and recognizes Eileen. Eileen dies in his arms, leaving the child to be taken care of by him, which he is only too willing to do.

A Good Sport

Edison. Two Reels. Released October 21st.

The Sphinx Motion Picture Company had been devoting all of its efforts to Wild West shows, until it became apparent that the public wanted a change. About the only thing the boys could do was ride, and they sure could ride. The director decided that if he could only find a typical Englishman he would make a hit with "Polo" pictures.

He inserted an advertisement in the local paper, which came to the attention of the Hon. Reginald Devenham, who was, to be brutally frank, "on his uppers."

He was just what they were looking for, and five dollars a day looked good to Reggy, but he was ready to balk when told he would have to kiss the heroine, remembering the little girl in England to whom he promised to be true. He found it an easier task upon beholding the little heroine.

Not long after, the girl in England went to the "Movies" and saw Reggy kiss the girl on the screen as he had never kissed her. She wired him to come back immediately.

The situation at the end of the picture in which the Englishman's true feelings toward the two girls are expressed is intensely amusing.

The Whimsical Threads of Destiny

Vitagraph. Two Reels. Released November 22nd.

Giles Webster, an eccentric millionaire, decides to test the character of his two heirs, a niece and a nephew.

He arranges so that they are notified of his death, and conceals himself in a secret apartment in his home.

One of the provisions of his will is that they shall marry.

The nephew, Dr. Walker, proves his worth by renouncing his claim to any part of the fortune to marry a circus rider whom he really loves.

The niece does not stand the test so well, and when the uncle reappears he denounces her for her unworthy conduct, and praises his nephew, to whom he bequeaths his fortune.

"The Subterranean City" or "Trailing the Jewel Thieves"

(Release Tuesday, November 25th)

Three of the leading jewelers of the city build a vast subterranean city deep into the mountains, and fill it with men and machinery to manufacture imitation jewelry! His suspicions excited at the opera by the peculiar actions of Vesta, a dancer, "Arizona Bill" bets to solve the mystery of the imitation jewelry.

You will never know what thrills a Motion Picture can afford, or to what extent the personal daring of a single actor can add to the tense excitement of an audience, until you see "Arizona Bill" hurtle head foremost into the rocks fifty feet below—until you see him in the jaws of a great diamond-making machine—until you see him fire a revolver within an inch of his temple. All these and many more afford a variety of blood-stirring moments, the like of which we have never seen before.

The story is enthralling, the acting is magnificent, and you will see in the subterranean city the most wonderful relics of ancient architectural grandeur imaginable. You will hear the query in your audience, "Where was it made? At the dead cities of Herculaneum, or Pompeii, perhaps?" And, referring again to the marvelous daring of "Arizona Bill," they will ask, "How did he do it—how could he do it?"

Frankly, we don't know. We can only tell you that you will see it done and rejoice in the bravery of the man who does it.

Every exhibitor should book "The Subterranean City." An intellectual audience will revel in the ancient lure of dead cities, and thrill with the street urchin in the mighty deeds of "Arizona Bill."

Facts and Comments

THERE is such a thing as the ethics of advertising, and every reputable paper is bound thereby. Under normal conditions the advertisers themselves observe the ethics of their science. Science is the right word, for of all the engines of modern civilization none is more delicately constructed than the machinery of advertising. It is an axiom with professional advertising men to avoid all kinds of controversial advertising. The public is interested in competition but not in controversies between advertisers. Take the ten biggest advertisers in the country, examine their appeals to the public, delve into the wording of their "ads" and you cannot find even the faintest trace of controversial advertising. Why not? Simply because controversial and abusive advertising is based on a low estimate of the public intelligence. Clever advertising men know that the public is quick to resent even an implied insult to their intelligence. Controversial and abusive advertising and denouncing "the other fellow" is passing out of fashion. It is not only in bad taste but it is wasteful because it does not put the advertising space to the best use possible. Devote all your advertising to a clear exposition of the merits of whatever you advertise and then leave something to the intelligence of the readers. If your competitor produces inferior things, be satisfied to let the reader discover it for himself. Every reference to your competitor, whether good, bad or indifferent, adds to your competitor's publicity. The public looks with just suspicion upon the comments which one advertiser makes upon the products of another. Such comments beget a feeling of humorous contempt. Clean, vigorous and dignified advertising is the only advertising worth while. Such advertising reflects the quality of the advertiser and of the thing advertised and makes a most desirable impression upon the desirable reader.

Under the law the publisher of a newspaper is responsible for any matter which appears anywhere in his publication. It does not matter how the matter got there. There have been cases where libelous matter in advertisements found its way into the paper against the explicit instructions of the publisher. The law will not allow him to plead such a circumstance in defense. It is therefore a matter of self-protection with a responsible publisher to edit all advertising copy with his eye on the libel law. If advertisers feel that they must say unpleasant things about their competitors, they may take a chance in the "house organs," but no paper printed for the benefit of the entire industry can afford to be made the tool of business and personal animosities.

THE State of Ohio is now under the operation of the so-called State Censorship Law, and since the fourth of November it has been a criminal offense to show motion pictures within the State limits without the approbation of the State censors. From reports which have reached us it would seem that the motion picture business in Ohio is, for the time being, somewhat confused. The law, it seems, has been made retroactive. It applies not alone to films released since the enactment of the law but to all films whatsoever, no matter when they were released. The most deplorable feature of the situation lies in the fact that the organized exhibitors or their leader are really responsible for this most dangerous piece of legislation. We fear that while the jurisdiction of Ohio censorship is, of course, limited, its influence upon other States will be pernicious. It will place a weapon in the hands of the "cranks," whom nothing will satisfy short of the utter destruction of the motion picture, and it will stimulate an unwholesome interest in the ranks of the politicians. Granting that the Ohio censors are not only infallible but likewise incorruptible, it does not follow that censor boards in other States will be equally perfect. The opportunities for graft which the good censors of Ohio are capable of resisting may be too much for other boards of censors with a less athletic moral equipment.

Every intelligent and sincere friend of the motion picture will be glad to learn that one of the groups of organized producers has decided to attack the statute in the courts on the ground of its unconstitutionality. We earnestly hope that, if necessary, the question will be carried into the highest court of the land. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD holds to the belief that such legislation violates the guarantees of the organic law and will be annulled as soon as it gets into the higher courts. The men who have financed this fight against legalized censorship in Ohio deserve great credit and are entitled to the earnest support of every exhibitor. We have no reason to believe that the contest will not be made in good faith or upon an insufficient plea of facts.

Rising Stars

By Louis Reeves Harrison

CALLED suddenly and unexpectedly to my feet at a formidable gathering of newspaper men one evening last month when a great deal had been said about the luminous bodies of the motion-picture firmament, I expressed myself as ineffectually as most men do under such circumstances. I had been for weeks circulating among a lot of fire-worshipers, men who bow down from habit to the luster of past performers, who are occasionally so dazzled by what has been that they are blind to what is and is to be, and some thoughts on the subject were gathering but not crystalized. I left with a miserable sense of having tried to shoot an unloaded gun; and badly aimed, at that. Never again!

Merely as one of millions who have watched the development of moving pictures to the highest forms of present production, I entertained still higher hopes for the New Art. Because it has given opportunity for men who found other avenues of self-expression closed by those who clung to prehuman ideals, because such a vast amount of technical knowledge is required before men of original and interesting ideas can enter the literary or the dramatic fields, it seemed to me that genius of the period in which we are living would find its first expression and exert its most powerful influence through screen portrayals.

Our greatest scientists have been long years in reaching the sound conclusion that genius is universal among intelligent people. There is radium in all the pitchblende of our social body, awaiting opportunity, without which there can be no success, for release. Inasmuch as the technics of screen representation are almost entirely in the hands of directors and actors, the man who has something worth while to communicate is not so much hampered with manipulation as in other arts. Men of intellect plus knowledge may light the torches of other minds from their own with less knowledge of methods than in any other medium of communication.

For the novelist, for the artist, even for the dramatist, there are to be mastered so many things that pertain to the practical part, to a knowledge of the mechanics of self-expression, that men of creative imagination are hampered, if not forever silenced, and the few who eventually burst their bonds do so at a tremendous cost of energy. To spread what they have to say, they must eternally battle with obstacles that narrow their mental horizon. Screen production, when treatment is in the hands of capable directors and interpretation largely a matter of intelligent acting, seems to offer what has been lacking, freedom for the forces of the human mind.

The human mind of today is occupied with problems, physical, mental, social, political, industrial, questions of combination and competition, and it needs both facts and ideals for enlightenment. We are flung this way and that by the whirlwinds of circumstance, and all thinking people are awaiting some attempt at the solution of modern social conundrums. We will not be content with the actual—the possible must be pictured and stimulus to its attainment given by popularizing all that is known by keen and intellectual observers of what is going on all around us.

We have just been appalled by disgraceful disclosures attending the impeachment of New York's chief executive, by the lawlessness of men who make our laws and of men placed in high office to enforce them. There is present a tremendous awakening of conscience, growth of new sympathy, susceptibility to wrongs being perpetrated before our very eyes, while we stand helplessly looking on. It would seem that the administration of government is nothing more than organization for graft, with no thought of the welfare of the people. There is splendid dramatic material for some rising genius to whip into shape, yet we are asked to regard as a star attraction what other people did in other days, and to watch some old performer stagger through the principal part.

We love our country and detest these treasonable practices because they are destroying all that we are trying to build up. It is near to our hearts that these agents of destruction should be pointed out and branded with ignominy. The fire that is smouldering within us is not to be blown into flame by past performers in plays that contain nothing vital to present interest. There is opportunity in screen portrayal to stir the spirit of the times, arousing people all over the world to a sense of their power, of their responsibilities, of their weaknesses. Greater even than the press may the pictured presentation of the truth in contrast with error become if it deals with questions occupying the universal human mind.

I do NOT mean that moving picture exhibitions shall be turned into "Chautauquas." The dramatist must put himself in the position of the spectator in writing plays for the screen, and the best of these representations are "the efforts of imaginative sympathy." The story must be taken to heart before its underlying purpose is disclosed, and it need not be distinctly shown. It should be felt. Great essential, however, is that there should be something in it to feel.

Amid all political and social corruption of the time, new ideas are flourishing, gathering strength from the decay all around them, radiating beauty wherever the light of new opportunity stimulates their growth. Modern writers are catching the spirit of evolutionary science, are pointing out the significance of what is behind human development, are utilizing in drama and fiction those forces which change the current of thought and conduct among leading nations of the world, are demonstrating that the power of circumstances can be held in control and put to good use, instead of carrying us unresisting on a restless ebb and flow.

These are rising stars, and they are affected, just as men in other lines of work, by adequate or inadequate compensation for effort. The dramatist is paid a royalty that is proportioned to the success of his play. The author is paid a percentage on the sale of his novel. The New Art needs what such men can do, for stories old enough to pension, if they are not archaic, do not make for progress. If what is considered reasonable and fair in other arts was offered for feature plays along new and powerful lines, the cost of what is to be produced is so relatively small in proportion to the cost of producing it that the total amount of percentage paid on a highly successful feature play would stagger no one.

There is nothing personal in my advocacy of this step in the right direction, except that I believe in moving pictures as a splendid medium of thought conveyance. Through them the fruit of knowledge can be scattered broadcast. Through them works of the imagination that deepen character, or that soften and stir the heart, may find their most fascinating presentment. Their mission will be greatly enlarged by intelligent treatment of what is of vital interest to all, and, above all, it is well to keep in mind that no art can progress rapidly that disregards creative talent of the period.

Educational Catalogues—III

By W. Stephen Bush

IN my last article I pointed out that every catalogue must stand or fall with its subdivisions. I have carefully looked over the whole list of subdivisions as given in the Rules of The American Library Association, and I think that the subdivisions mentioned there may with easy logic be ranged under the ten grand divisions which I have enumerated in the last issue of The Moving Picture World. I now wish to call special attention to Grand Division No. 6, Popular Science. We have a rather large supply of motion pictures of some scientific value, but not one of these pictures has been taken under strict scientific direction or for the express purpose of scientific research. In other words, there are no strictly scientific pictures. We have had pictures dealing with hygiene and surgery and engineering and agriculture. May we not put all these subdivisions logically under "Popular Science"?

The word "Popular" in this connection denotes plainly enough that no technical pictures are meant, but that the pictures so classified contain some scientific value for the spectator. I think the following subdivisions may be placed in the grand division "Popular Science": Physics, Mechanics, Hydraulics, Optics, Heat, Electricity, Chemistry, Mineralogy, Geology, Biology, Evolution, Botany, Medicine, Forestry, Physiology, Public Health and, as mentioned before, Hygiene, Surgery, Engineering and Agriculture. More subjects can be put under "Popular Science" by way of subdividing than under "Useful Arts," which latter classification, as I have sought to show, is rather arbitrary even in the cataloguing of a library. Take Grand Division No. 9, Animal Life. Any student in high school will see how easy it is to group comprehensive and logical subdivisions under this grand division. I only mention a few: Vertebrate and Invertebrate. The subdivisions of both of these classifications may easily be followed up by consulting a good dictionary. There are, of course, other subdivisions just as good. It is not necessary to go into too much detail; I only want to show that in the ten grand divisions I have suggested there is ample room for clear and detailed subdivisions.

The subdivisions for History (No. 4) are easily arranged by following the periods and the nations of history. Biography is another plain subdivision of History. We have had quite a budget of releases dealing in a dramatic way with important questions, and where the social question is kept in the foreground and the dramatic element merely serves as a sort of prop or scaffolding, I think it is entirely proper to classify these releases under "Social Economics." Aside from the large number of such subjects which have been filmed by the Edison Company there are such recent releases as "The Pit of the Installment Plan," "The Loan Sharks," "In the Hands of the Land Sharks," Prison Reforms, Juvenile Courts. Many more of a similar character might be mentioned, and they all have a distinct value as lessons in social economics.

It will be seen at a glance that the grand division "Geography, Travel and Description" subdivides itself into three kindred but different subjects, and there is room for many other logical subdivisions. One subdivision that might be suggested is that of the countries with which the pictures deal, making the continents of the world another group of easy subdivisions. It cannot be my purpose here to suggest every possible subdivision; that is a matter which must be left to the individual cataloguer and his particular supply of pictures and his particular needs. He cannot go far astray if he looks at the Rules of the American Library Association in finding comprehensive subdivisions. These rules may be consulted at any public library. No cataloguer will turn out a perfect catalogue the first time he tries. Practice will suggest the needful changes that have to be made from time to time, and as in other things practice will make perfect in the science of cataloguing.

How are the subdivisions to be grouped and arranged? The handiest method, no doubt, is the alphabetical arrangement. This arrangement had best be followed in marshaling the pictures themselves. In this way the meshes of the net will be tightened and no subject can slip out. I may say in connection with this matter that the producer of educational subjects will do well to make his titles clear, simple and always to the point. This is a great aid in classification. The name of the producer ought to appear just as the name of the author is printed on the book. This is not only valuable information for the man in search of educational pictures but it gives just and proper credit to the producer. The least experience in looking for good educational programs will show the importance of giving the name of the producer. Subjects can be numbered in accordance with the decimal system just the same as under the Dewey divisions. This enables the exchange man to pick out his subject without any loss of time. He knows, for instance, that under the grand divisions given in the last article all subjects from 400 to 499 are in the division of History. The numerical order can easily be applied within each subdivision. Say the first subdivision in History is Antiquities. This would make Antiquities run, say, from 400 to 410. Say the last subdivision in History is Zion. This would make Zion 490 to 499.

Next in importance is the preparation of a short and comprehensive synopsis. Twelve or even fifteen words are not too much. I think, too, that the idea of the General Film Company to give the length of the reel is one that will prove of practical value.

I need scarcely say in conclusion that no one realizes better than I do the hasty and imperfect character of the suggestions here outlined. The best I can hope for is that others will improve on what has been so roughly sketched out here. As long as these lines stimulate an interest in catalogues and emphasize the necessity of growing with the educational picture the writer will consider himself amply rewarded. The educational picture is assuming greater importance every day, and every intelligent observer within the ranks of the industry realizes that proper cataloguing is the first requisite in the educational field today.

Adding a word in conclusion, I might say that good cataloguing increases the commercial value of the film, for even imperfect cataloguing is better than no cataloguing at all. The man in search of educational films is too easily discouraged, and when he finds that it will take him hours of valuable time to find the pictures he needs, he gives up the attempt or takes whatever comes to hand first, without any particular regard as to its fitness. An experienced exchange man in the West recently prepared a catalogue in which many faults might have been discovered, but he is our authority for saying that even this hasty effort helped the sale of his educational films.

The Theatre of Realization

What a "Master Builder Can Do with Motion Pictures—Regent Under New Management.

By W. Stephen Bush.

THE Regent Theater, at Seventh Avenue and 116th Street, opened last Saturday under the management of Mr. S. L. Rothapfel. The attendance was far in excess of the accommodations provided, and, from the appreciation and enthusiasm of the audience, the condition of S. R. O. promises to become chronic.

MR. S. L. ROTHAPFEL
Manager of the Regent Theater, New York City.

If the Regent Theater ever wants a surname, such as ancient monkish chroniclers were in the habit of bestowing on every great and important institution, the Regent Theater might well be called the "Theater of Realization." Mr. Rothapfel milked every opportunity of its best points and made a realization out of possibilities. What magic wand did this modest and pleasant-looking young man use to effect such a transformation? Why, he used no magic wand at all. He is working with precisely the same tools that are at the disposal of every other exhibitor. It is this fact which makes the opening and the new management of the Regent Theater not only interesting, but useful to every exhibitor in the country. The Regent Theater is a continuous practical demonstration of what can be done with the motion picture entertainment. Because of its doubtless value to the exhibitor I want to set down in some detail every one of the various factors which contribute to the splendid success of the Regent Theater.

To begin with: Mr. Rothapfel knows how to create a pleasant and agreeable atmosphere. He possesses the rare art of putting his patron at ease the moment he enters the theater. Surely this is an important item. The artist and the orator who have studied audiences know that the gaining of the good will of the audience is the best start possible. The patron is quite content to find this atmosphere around him, but does not care to analyze it. The experienced entertainer has no trouble in analyzing what constitutes the desirable atmosphere. It is nothing but the summing up of many apparently trifling details all working together to the same end. The good and well-considered lighting arrangements have something to do with it, so have the personality and the appearance and the manners of the employees, and the furnishings of the theater, and the order and decorum of the audience. In some indefinable way the impression runs through the audience that their comfort is carefully considered, and that they are going to be treated to a good entertainment. The patrons look around and observe and are pleased. This was evident from the first at the Regent Theater. There were things to delight the eye and ear before the entertainment proper had begun. A beautiful fountain played in front of the orchestra; the light effects had been most skillfully arranged; there was a happy medium between the glare and the somber. The decorations and the flowers were artistically distributed. No detail had been neglected—the hand of a "master builder" was recognized even in the preliminaries.

Mr. Rothapfel did wonders with his music, very ably assisted by Mr. Carl Edouarde and his brilliant orchestra. For the first time in this country I was made aware of the possibilities of the music. I had thought until then that London and Berlin had wrought wonders with motion picture music but I confess that at the Regent Theater a very high standard has been set. The music with Pathe's Weekly could not have been surpassed. To run appropriate music with short and widely different scenes is perhaps the severest test music can be put to in connection with motion pictures, but it was tried at the Regent and tried with decided success. For a few moments we saw a Russian picture, and immediately the orchestra intoned the solemn Russian national anthem to change, without a jar, to light American music, charmingly suitable to some scenes and events in California. The movements of the orchestra all through the evening were of extraordinary ease and smoothness, no doubt due to careful and painstaking rehearsals. What can be done with the right music was most plainly demonstrated in a two-reel Vitagraph, most fittingly chosen for such a glorious motion picture celebration. The title was "The War Makers." It is quite true that only the picture of high quality, for example, Vitagraph quality, will allow fullest sway and swing to the musical possibilities. The idea of Mr. Rothapfel and his musicians is to understand and then to seize the atmosphere of a picture, and, by means of playing strong and distinct "motifs," to stir and intensify the emotions of the audience. This makes the picture not only move, but live. It is a thought based on the philosophy of Wagner's music—it seeks to dramatize music. This method of treating the music with the pictures has one very practical advantage, for it does away with the need of many rapid changes.

When the overture was finished there was an electric burst of applause from the audience, and before the applause had died away the dark-colored curtain on the screen parted most gracefully and revealed the picture in full motion. It was a simple thing, but the effect was most pleasing. I may say here that readiness and smoothness characterized the unfolding of every part of the entertainment. Now, what was the picture? "A Journey Through Crimea." To be sure, the picture was finely projected; the light was perfect; the operator had his machine under easy control, and maintained just the right speed; but, after all, in the exhibitors' catalogue the picture was nothing more and nothing less than a "scenic"; it had been released on the 7th of October, and was in no way different from hundreds of other good scenic pictures. But for the frame in which it was set the program of four reels could have been had by any exhibitor who cared to pay for it. It was well selected, but no better selected than scores of other programs such as are offered to patrons of motion picture theaters every day in the week. It consisted of a scenic picture, of a first-class feature, and a good comedy.

What, then, were the added attractions? Of course, the most prominent of the added attractions was the manner of presentation, but there were other added attractions. The singers made their debuts in leafy bowers at each side of the proscenium, and were revealed to the audience by a very clever spotlight arrangement. Here the program differed widely from the average offering. Few of the old-fashioned "illustrated singers" survive to this day, and the song concerning the botanical environments of John when imprinting a kiss upon Mary is now rarely heard in the land. Rothapfel has artists singing for him, men and women who are gifted with good voices and who have spent some time training and cultivating their voices. The selections of songs were, I think, particularly happy; the popular kind predominated, but there was a touch of the concert program in some of them, and an artistic touch in all of them.

The prices of admission were fifteen cents all over the house, with the exception of the boxes and loges which are twenty-five cents. Matinee prices: Ten cents to all parts of the theater.

Such theaters as the Regent are what we all hope for. They are the best friends the motion picture industry has. It is well to set them on a hill that they may be see and imitated. They are bulwarks in the fight against the corruption of public taste.

There is one thing more deserving special notice. "The front" was conspicuous for its simplicity and the total absence of the "flashy" and lurid poster. No three sheets exuding blood, and no six sheets picturing murder. As it is, a religious belief in certain circles that nothing but the "paper" brings the crowd, I was wondering on what theory the Regent Theater managed to have a full house with another full house waiting in the lobbies and on the sidewalk.

Mr. Rothapfel and his able assistant, Mr. Edward Jillson, were, of course, very busy all evening, but Mr. Rothapfel found time to assure me that he had not yet struck his racing gait, that there were some rough edges left, and that he would like all his guests of the evening to come back in a few weeks when he had got under way. It is doubtful whether the guests could stand another such drain on their complimentary adjectives. We will all go back to the Regent, and we are glad to know where to conduct the next stranger who asks us to take him to the best motion picture house in the city.

OTHER AUSPICIOUS OPENINGS.

Burland Theater.

Another evidence that the new era of motion picture exhibition in the city of New York has arrived will be found in the new Burland Theater, 164th Street and Prospect Avenue, which opened its doors to the public for the first time Saturday evening, November 1. Entering the house from a spacious lobby off Prospect Avenue we entered an immense auditorium filled, at the time, to the last seat. Our guess was fifteen hundred people and that guess was confirmed by the manager, Mr. I. Picker who assured us that there were five hundred more in the gallery above. This proved true—the house was filled to capacity and it was a surprising thing that so many people could be assembled at one time in an outlying district of the city to view motion pictures.

The Burland Theater enterprise is a large one involving an investment of half a million dollars, including the value of the land occupied. The plot covered is 357 feet on Prospect Avenue and 135 on 164th Street. The theater entrance is in the center and small stores range on either side leaving a large area in the rear for the theater. Half this space is given over to an enclosed theater which seats, as before mentioned 2,000 people; the other half constitutes an cpen air theater or airdome, seating 3,000 people. The entire building is of fireproof construction after the latest and best designs. Ample provision has been made for the safety and comfort of patrons in the way of exits and retiring rooms.

The equipment of the house is of the best. In the projecting room are installed a Simplex, a Standard and a Kinemacolor projectors with a Wagner motor generator to control the current. The throw is 155 feet to a composition screen on the back wall of the building. For the open air theater this battery of projectors may be turned around so as to project the picture for the airdome for which the throw is 175 feet. Andrews chairs, costing about $3.00 each, provide a very comfortable seat in the closed theater. Benches are used in the airdome. Ventilating fans effect a rapid change of air.

Features from the All Star, Famous Players and Kinemacolor will rule the program at the Burland, supported from time to time with other feature productions from general sources. Music is provided by an orchestra of seven pieces and high-class singing numbers will be interspersed. Saturday evening's program was most pleasing in this respect. "Arizona" was presented at the first performance.

The prices of admission are ten and fifteen cents in the evening and five cents for matinees during the week. Sunday matinees will be ten cents.

Heights Theater.

The L. & B. Amusement Company opened a new picture theater at Wadsworth Avenue and 181st Street, New York City, on Saturday evening, October 11, to a large patronage and is enjoying a steady patronage of the most satisfactory character. W. A. Landau, formerly proprietor of the Audubon Theater, in 181st Street, is president of the company, and S. G. Bock, who was connected with the St. Nicholas Theater, in the same neighborhood, is secretary and treasurer. The new house is of regular theater construction, seats 600 persons and has twelve exits. The construction is fireproof throughout. Two Standard projecting machines and a mercury arc rectifier have been installed, providing a fine picture at a throw of 110 feet. The chairs are from the American Seating Company. An indirect lighting system and large exhaust fans for ventilating complete an up-to-date equipment. Retiring rooms for men and women insure the comfort of the patrons. A Hope-Jones unit orchestra provides music for the pictures.

The Riverview Theatre

It is natural that the more recent photoplay houses should incorporate the best points of those already built, so it is hardly safe yet to say of any that it is absolutely perfect. Some one may yet go one better and astonish us with some convenience unthought of. But leaving out the hypothetical, it is safe at this writing to say that the Riverview Theater, of the Quincy Amusement Company, at One Hundredth Street and Broadway, New York, combines more advantages with less disadvantages than any other house in the Greater City.

There is not much to attract attention to it from the outside, except that no one can pass it without knowing that it is a building devoted to projecting photoplays. The front of the building, like a well-written advertisement, is clear, but unpretentious; there is nothing to suggest the old-style show. One passing will be more apt to say, "Here is a good place to see the best and most up-to-date pictures." And this impression will be heightened on his entering the vestibule, inside the swinging doors. It runs the whole width of the front, is spacious and cheery. It is floored with marble and painted in light colors and in a prominent place one will find seven clean-cut billboards on which he may read the offerings provided for every day in the current week. Glancing over these, and finding that there is a special feature from the licensed group of manufacturers offered each day and that on the day of its release (except Sunday, on which one of the Friday specials is given), and furthermore that this is reinforced by three regular releases, all pictures of the current day, it is natural for him to turn to the box office and buy admission.

Once inside he is reassured, even if it be before the show begins, by the cleanness and signs of comfort that meet him, The room is 219 feet deep, 35 feet from floor to ceiling, and 40 feet wide. There are 1,000 seats in it, but they are generously spaced and comfortable. The floor is of concrete covered along the isles with heavy matting.

These isles are very wide, five or six persons could walk abreast on them. The patron, if it be his first visit, will glance around and perhaps wonder where the projecting room is located. It is directly over his head, if he seated at about the middle of the room, but looks so like a natural part of the building that he may not find it until he has traced back the faintly seen diamond rays from the picture on the screen to the aperture.

From this operating aperture to the screen is 150 feet. The screen is 14 x 18 feet and gives a remarkable clean-cut and lifelike image. Just what the screen is and how it is made the management do not care to divulge, it being a secret process of their own; but assuredly it is a good screen for pictures. Of the projection, we can only say that it is very nearly perfect. Steady, bright, flickerless pictures are demanded by the class of patrons at the Riverview, and the Quincy Amusement Company can take pride in the projection they provide. The Power's 1913 machines are in the operating room driven by motors and the five reels of each day's show follow each other with the regularity of a chronometer.

The music and picture accompaniment is furnished by one player during the day, and an orchestra at night. The orchestra is not greatly missed in the afternoons, for a Wurlitzer organ, which costs $10,000, can make thunder and trumpet calls as well as church bells, music for tango dances or martial strains for grand parades and many other sounds. We might add that it is extremely well played.

As the patron leaves the house he will find a court 10 feet wide outside down both sides and across the back. To this exit, opening on it, doors throughout the entire length of the building permit the room, though filled to its limit capacity, to be emptied almost at once. The cubic capacity of the room is such that no smoke could fill it before it could be entirely emptied, but it is built wholly of fireproof material. One remarkable thing about it is that it is cool in summer and warm in winter with its steam heating system. The house is under the immediate management of Mr. William E. Jones and of Jack T. Harris, who make it a point to take care of their patrons' comfort in every way.

NEW THEATER AT LOWELL.

Samuel Orbach is building a new fireproof theater at Lowell, Mass. The new house is on a plot 72 by 180 feet, and will seat 1,500 on one floor. One of the novel features will be a sliding roof that can be moved to give an open-air effect to the house in summer. Two Power's 6A machines with a motor generator set will be installed in the projecting room. The curtain and scenery will be furnished by the Lee Lash Company. It is estimated that the cost of the house and equipment will be about $30,000, and the date for opening has been set early in December. Mr. Orbach was formerly proprietor and manager of the Colonial Theater, Lowell.

"The Octoroon"

Kalem Makes a Fine Feature Picture Based on Boucicault's Famous Melodrama—Many Thrilling Situations.

AMONG the legitimate dramatic productions that have made their mark on the American stage, few are more adaptable to the requirements of the motion picture producer than that famous old melodrama, "The Octoroon," written by Dion Boucicault. Though the story it tells and the times and questions it deals with have long since ceased to possess the vital interest they did at the time the play was written, the subject is replete with thrilling situations that serve to make the picture one of unusual interest.

Scene from "The Octoroon" (Kalem).

The story is that of a young man who returns to his home in the south after many years' absence. It is during slavery days, and when the young man falls in love with an octoroon girl a difficult situation is created. This is further complicated when a former overseer buys the unfortunate girl at an auction of slaves after having stolen her freedom papers. To make matters worse, this overseer, who is the villain of the play, kills a boy and rifles the mail bag he carried containing valuable letters.

Subsequently the overseer's crime is discovered by means of a photograph which was taken at the time the murder was committed and he is arrested and placed upon a river steamboat to be taken to jail. He sets fire to the boat and escapes, but is followed by the Indian companion of the murdered boy, who finally kills him.

Scene from "The Octoroon" (Kalem).

With the discovery of the overseer's crime the freedom papers of the octoroon girl are recovered, together with the letter containing a draft of sufficient amount to release the plantation from the debt to the overseer. But the octoroon, believing that she is doomed to become the slave of the overseer, commits suicide just as her freedom is regained, and her lover is thus released.

In producing this picture the Kalem Company has secured the true southern atmosphere. The scenes were taken in Florida and are beautiful to the last degree. Guy Coombs takes the part of George Peyton, the leading male character, and Marguerite Courtot is particularly charming in the part of Zoe, the octoroon. The fire on the river boat is sufficiently realistic to satisfy the most exacting critic; it gives a distinct thrill. Exciting indeed is the chase of the overseer by the Indian. It is with considerable suspense that we watched the frantic flight of the overseer and the stealthy trailing of his victim by the avenger. We were not permitted to witness the final struggle in its entirety, but a white clutching hand, trembling for a moment above the reeds of a swamp, and presently the appearance of the Indian wiping his knife tells the story of vengeance accomplished.

That the Kalem players have done justice to the play in this excellent production will be the verdict of all who see it. The story is well told and the picture, in its entirety, is fully as interesting as the dramatic rendition. It will prove a distinct feature.

Much Ado About a Comma.

A Matter of Punctuation in New York's Picture Code Results in Differences of Opinion.

THERE is a difference of opinion between a number of motion picture exhibitors in New York City and their architects and the men to whom are delegated the powers of issuing licenses for the new theaters under the code signed by Mayor Gaynor on July 8 last. The chief bone of contention is Paragraph 2 of Section 352D. It reads as follows in the code as furnished by the Mayor's Bureau of Licenses:

> 2. Prohibition—Motion picture theaters shall not be constructed in frame buildings within the fire limits, nor in hotels, tenement houses or lodging houses, nor in factories or workshops, except where the theater is separated from the rest of the building by unpierced fireproof walls and floors, and in no case shall they be constructed or operated above or below the ground floor of any building.

That seems plain enough to be understood even by the man who runs as he reads. It means, of course, that motion picture theaters may be constructed in frame buildings within the fire limits—in hotels, tenement houses and lodging houses, in factories and workshops—where the theater is separated from the rest of the building by unpierced fireproof walls and floors. No such interpretation is placed upon the section by the Bureau of Licenses, however. It is contended that there is an error in the section as printed; that there should be a semicolon after the words "lodging houses," and that such was the intent of the framers of the code. Michael Furst, of Brooklyn, a well-known lawyer, an intimate friend of the late Mayor Gaynor, and by him named as the chairman of the committee to draft a working set of laws for the government of picture houses, was asked over the telephone as to his knowledge of the paragraph. In a voice indicative of patient sorrow more than of anger, Mr. Furst said that the question of the punctuation of this paragraph had caused him more trouble than had been entailed in the formulation of the rest of the code. He said if he had changed the persevering comma once into a semicolon, he had changed it a dozen times; that it had been the intention of the committee to prohibit absolutely the issuing of licenses for picture theaters in hotels, tenement houses or lodging houses and permit them in factories or workshops where they were cut off by unpierced fireproof walls and floors. When it was suggested to Mr. Furst that the writer had been assured that the law as signed by Mr. Gaynor contained a comma, Mr. Furst said the only way to be sure was to look at the original document in the office of the city clerk. THE WORLD man accordingly did so. A comma it was, just as quoted in the section printed herewith.

When Mr. Furst was told that the document as signed by Mr. Gaynor contained a comma after the words "lodging houses" he was much surprised. He brought out a copy of the City Record of May 9, 1912, in which was printed in full the Folks ordinance for regulating motion picture theaters. This was after a public hearing had been held on the proposed code. There appears a semicolon at the disputed point. Mr. Furst said it was reasonable to assume that the code should be construed in accordance with the intent of the legislator. In this opinion he was joined by Assistant Corporation Counsel Crowell, who believed no licenses would be issued if a mistake had been made, and that none would be issued until the error had been corrected by amendment.

Several unsuccessful attempts were made to reach James G. Wallace, chief of the Bureau of Licenses, in order to learn the attitude of his bureau in the matter. In his absence, Mr. Culleton, who is listed in the department directory as bookkeeper, and also as having in charge the issuance of licenses to "public dance halls, moving picture theaters" and "applications for new pool table licenses," said there had been a conference between department chiefs and officials of the bureau and that it had been decided to construe the law as its originators had intended. In other words, picture theaters shall not be constructed in frame buildings within the fire limits; nor in hotels, tenement houses or lodging houses; they may be constructed in factories or workshops where the theater is separated from the rest of the building by unpierced fireproof walls and floors.

"The Subterranean City"

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

ECLIPSE has furnished the spectator with a series of astounding sights and acts in a two-reel subject, "The Subterranean City," that fairly rival the wonders of "Aladdin's Lamp." True, there is no mystifying genii present to bestow talismanic powers and raise enchanting palaces before your eyes with the suddenness of a flash of light, but hair-raising feats are performed which, seemingly, defy the laws of gravitation, and we are conducted through the mazes of an underground city that reveal strange architecture — monster formations that bear the marks of the titanic force of the volcano, as well as of the puny handiwork of man.

Scene from "The Subterranean City" (Eclipse).

These films have been made, for the larger part, under great difficulties. The director, the principal actors, the camera man and the light effect man all share in them, and all are to be complimented on the result.

Joe Hamman and Mrs. Hamman center all eyes on their daredevil exploits. Mr. Hamman will be remembered by his extra hazardous feats on horseback and otherwise in former Eclipse films, but it can be vouched that he has put in the shade, in this instance, all his former deeds of daring. We see him apparently falling from a precipice down into an abyss hundreds of feet deep. No doubt the tricks of the camera have enabled him several times to perform the impossible, and many will gasp at the illusions, in the belief that they are real. The escape of Arizona Bill (Joe Hamman) and Vesta (Mrs. Hamman) down a high, overhanging cliff, by means of a rope, is a real exploit, except in the final fall where the camera is employed to deceive the eye. The actor who takes the part of John Walker, the merchant jeweler, who has been systematically robbed, can take credit for very fine character work.

Scene from "The Subterranean City" (Eclipse).

The scenes of the story are supposedly laid in France. John Walker, a prominent jeweler, is awakened one night by a noise that seems to come from his strong room. On examination, he finds that the door of the large safe is open and that the watchman is asleep. His clerk and he make an inventory of the jewels and find that none is missing. Next morning, however, it is discovered that imitation jewels have been substituted in every case.

The robbery is the talk of the city and of the Merchants' Club. Arizona Bill, a friend of Walker, is present at the club and is invited by his host to the theater, where a celebrated dancer, Vesta, is the rage. After the performance, Walker and his friend call on the dancer in her dressing-room, where she is presented with a valuable necklace by the merchant. Vesta is attracted by Bill, who overlooks his gloves when the visitors leave the room.

Soon after their departure Vesta admits a member of the jewel thieves' gang, to whom she hands the necklace. While they are engaged in conversation, Bill returns for his gloves and awaits an answer to his knock. Being detained, he looks through the keyhole and sees the strange visitor talking to Vesta. When he is admitted the stranger has disappeared, having made his exit through the only window in the room. Bill's suspicions connect Vesta with the thieves, and at the club next evening he makes a bet of $5,000 with Walker that he will discover the band within a month.

Next day he follows Vesta to the wonderful subterranean city where the thieves have their workshops. He succeeds in entering after many perilous escapes and is discovered by the gang. To his surprise, he finds that several prominent members of the Merchants' Club are leaders of the gang. These men give orders for the murder of Bill, and he is saved just in time by Vesta's intervention and quick wittedness.

Vesta, being unable to extricate Bill from his prison, rushes to the city and discloses the secret to Walker, who is skeptical of the whole story. They are interrupted by the entrance of the leader of the gang, whose villainy is unknown to Walker. This man, when alone with Vesta, charges her with being a traitor, and, at pistol point, he forces her to the underground city where she is thrown into the same abyss into which Bill had been cast a few hours before.

The prisoners make their escape after many perils, and Bill acquaints the chief of police with the facts, with the result that the jewel thieves are all arrested. The release date is set for November 25.

MAX ASHER.

Famous Dutch Comedian in Universal Comedies.

Max Asher, famous vaudeville comedian, is playing leads in comedies now being released under the Joker brand and directed by Allen Curtis. While Mr. Asher's training has been extensive, he has always displayed a natural aptitude for the work—born to it, one might say. German character has been his specialty in the past. He is a Californian, having seen the light of day first in Oakland. After a good number of years spent in burlesque, musical comedy and stock, he made his first moving picture appearance in the Keystone comedies. From there he joined out with the Universal West Coast Company some months ago, to essay character leads.

Max Asher.

His first big success with the Universal was in the burlesque-comedy, "The Cheese Special." This comedy was hailed by critics as one of the biggest laugh-provoking sketches released in months, barring none. Mr. Asher assumed the villain role—that of a Banker who lived over again the old song "And the Villain still pursued 'er." He pursued the heroine, Miss Louise Fazenda, with mighty persistency, bringing down peals of laughter.

"Throwing the Bull," a Joker comedy released the week following, November 1st, is another burlesque that shows up the marked ability of this actor. His efforts in the immediate future will be confined wholly to playing leads for the Joker comedies under director Curtis.

EDUCATIONAL "FLYING A."

The American Film Mfg. Co. will release a short educational subject under the title of "A Modern Steel Plant," giving a general survey of this stupendous industry. On the same reel will be a comedy-drama entitled: "The Tale of the Ticker," release date November 20th.

Miss Pickford at Her Best

In "Caprice," a Four-Part Famous Players Production, She Gives Unusually Fine Performance.

By George Blaisdell.

IF you would see a delightful picture go see Miss Pickford in "Caprice." In the introduction we are given a diamond in the rough. At the conclusion we see the polished gem. For every facet in the stone Little Mary gives a new definition of caprice. Mercy is a child of moods—we laugh with her, and as suddenly check ourselves as we see the cloud pass over her face. Throughout the four parts it seems as if the heartstrings are under the influence of a hair-trigger control; and there is no foretelling a moment in advance on which side of the emotions the strain will lie. To be sure, mostly it is genuine humor; but there is never any certainty about it.

Scene from "Caprice" (Famous Players).

"Caprice," as older theatergoers may remember, is the story in which the then Minnie Maddern achieved her first success. A country girl is wooed and won by a youth from the city. The lad's father opposes the match, unsuccessfully. The bridegroom soon comes to the conclusion his father was right. The bride is taken home by her father. Then she is sent to boarding school, where her chum proves to be her sister-in-law; but the wife conceals her identity. The husband is taken abroad by his father, the better to forget his matrimonial troubles. The husband returns in time for the commencement ball. He cannot find the wife, who has departed from her home. He meets her later at the ball. All's well that ends well.

Scene from "Caprice" (Famous Players).

We are treated to a hearty laugh in the opening. A young hunter is treed by a bear. Bruin is going right up after him. Mercy appears and calls off the animal. We see him descend and not only eat out of her hand but follow her home, with the hunter bringing up a discreet rear. In the following scenes Jack Darnton, a young man from the city, accidentally shoots Mercy in the arm. He carries her home. The friendship begins right here.

It is not possible to enumerate the many fine situations crowded into this picture. There is the dramatic interview of Jack's father with Mercy in which he tells the girl her marriage with his son will ruin the young man's life. There are the humor and the pathos of the girl's attempt to commit suicide with a bulletless weapon, which she conceals from her own sight as she writes a word of farewell. There is the gayety of the wedding morn, when she loads corn into the front of her bridal gown and goes out to feed the chickens; and the attempted interference of Jack's father. There are the scenes following the marriage, when the husband is ashamed of his mountain bride; where in response to a suggestion of her father, she puts the lamp in the window as a signal for him to come and get her. Then, too, there are the many good situations in the boarding school—the ridicule of her fellow-pupils changed to respect and admiration on account of her heroic work when the structure took fire and Mercy carried down the stairs a girl bigger than herself. In fitting conclusion there are the rapid alternations of comedy and pathos in the last part, when the husband is unable to identify beyond doubt the little woman in finery, but who, when arrayed in her old-time mountain garb, is taken to his arms.

The backgrounds are well chosen, some of the exteriors being of marked beauty. The studio work is of the usual Famous Players standard. One of the big sets is the ballroom scene, in the last act. The support is excellent. Owen Moore, as Jack, does well the much he has to do. James Gordon, as Jack's father, is strong in a part not always popular. Others who materially contribute to the making of the picture are "Boots" Wall and Ogden Crane.

On the story side "Caprice" is as clean as a whistle. As a four-part comedy-drama it is a rare production. It is a picture containing so many fine touches one viewing serves only to whet the appetite for another look.

WALTER PRITCHARD—CAMERAMAN.

Walter Pritchard is the name of the modest and worthy young man, whose likeness is given herewith. Mr. Pritchard, though scarcely more than a boy, is one of the oldest, most active and best cameramen in the business. Knowing ones have bestowed upon him the appellation of "The Young Wizard of the Camera." And we, bearing in mind his remarkable photographic work, quite agree with them.

Walter Pritchard.

Young Pritchard is a product of Bayonne, N. J. A little over four years ago he was in charge of the Centaur plant there. Later, soon after the birth of the Nestor Film, he was promoted to do camera work. His success was instantaneous, and in a few months the Nestor photography had won a worldwide repute for excellence. "The Worth-While Film," as Nestor was christened by Charles Simone, became partly so through the splendid photographic efforts of Mr. Pritchard.

Two years ago, when the Nestor companies (three of them), were transplanted to Hollywood, Cal., young Pritchard was both cameraman for the Fahrney company and head of the Nestor laboratory in the west. After having materially aided in making some two hundred Nestor successes, he was captured by the Kay-Bee Co., and for several months photographed their big productions. The Universal Film Mfg. Co., finally succeeded in regaining his services and put him to work on special features.

Mr. Pritchard is now in the east enjoying a well-deserved vacation. On leaving Los Angeles, his fellow-members of the Photoplayers and Static clubs gave him a royal send-off.

HAROLD FOSBERG JOINS SELIG STOCK.

Harold Fosberg, a well known young actor, who for several seasons past has been associated with Belasco's successes, notably "The Woman," has become a member of the Selig Stock Company and assumed leading roles with that organization. Mr. Fosberg is not inexperienced in the art of motography, and is considered a valuable acquisition.

New Jersey Motion Picture Commission

Makes Interesting Report on Investigation at a Meeting Held In Newark—Some Recommendations.

By the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S. T. B.

THE Motion Picture Commission of the State of New Jersey met last Thursday afternoon, October 30, in its rooms in the Wiss Building, 665 Broad Street, Newark, N. J. This committee was formed last spring of delegates from the various civic and social welfare societies, the probation officers and other official and semi-official bodies in the state, and a number of exhibitors, for the purpose of investigating the conditions as to the moving picture business in the state with a view to having enacted a state law which would both head off a lot of foolish and ignorant local legislation, and, at the same time, would tend to the protection of the best interests of all concerned. To safeguard the interests of the picture business, two exhibitors, Mr. Louis F. Blumenthal and Mr. Joseph Steiner, were appointed members of the committee.

During the past summer different members of the committee sent out letters asking for definite information and opinion from various classes of persons as follows: Miss Louise Connolly, to librarians; Mrs. H. C. Warren, to women's clubs; Miss Josephine Baldwin, to Sunday school associations; Mr. Louis F. Blumenthal, to film producers; Mr. Charles Scott, to Y. M. C. A.'s; Miss Ethel M. McKee, to Y. W. C. A.'s; Miss Harriet Townsend, to charity organizations; Mrs. C. B. Alexander, to lawyers and judges; Mr. John J. Gascoyne, to probation officers; Mr. Winston Paul, to mayors; the Rev. H. H. Gifford, to members of the Social Service Commission of the Diocese of New Jersey; the Rev. Augustin Elmendorf, to members of the Social Service Commission of the Diocese of Newark; Miss Emily S. Hamblen, to license clerks and attendance officers; the Rev. Charles N. Thomas, to rural communities; Miss Cornelia Bradford, to settlement houses, and the Rev. L. L. Hand, to the Junior O. U. A. M. A follow-up letter was sent out on October 1, and the results, as tabulated and presented to the meeting in the report of the secretary, Miss Louise Connolly, are given below. The number of persons who made each answer is given after the reply:

1. Educational Aspect.

The educational value of motion pictures is great if the conditions are right, 12; There is a great field for co-operation between commercial shows and schools, 3; Picture theaters are now used somewhat by public schools, 7; Present commercial shows now give occasional educational pictures, 21; At present these theaters do good, 1; They compete with the saloons and thus decrease the consumption of alcohol, 1; Their moral tone now is better than that of the regular theaters, 1; They serve to Americanize foreigners, 1; Good pictures, if dramatic, please, 1; Humorous pictures are most pleasing, 1; So-called educational pictures do not please, 1; Places that have tried well-selected pictures educational even only one-quarter do not succeed, 3; There is no beneficial effect, 2; The character of the present shows is good, 15; The pictures now shown are all right for adults, 1; Schools should run such shows, 1; Home and school associations have shows, 2; Public libraries should run such shows, 2; Few Y. M. C. A.'s do run such shows number of answers not given); The circulation of special books like "Quo Vadis" is increased by moving pictures, 2; Library circulation is decreased in general by moving pictures, 3; Library circulation is not affected in any way, 2; The moral standards of the moving pictures are generally lower than is that of books read by the same people, 5.

2. Censorship.

Comments and Resolutions of the Report.

"From the foregoing it will be seen that there are many opinions upon many points. It is apparently the general opinion that the shows now do some good, but should do much more; that educational agencies should use them, but generally do not, and that where they do they are not always successful. It seems practically unanimous that the pictures should be censored by some one and that the pictures shown in New Jersey generally have passed the national board. There are differences as to whether the censoring should be left to the work of the national board, or placed in the hands of a state or local board. There are three warnings not to restrict too much, and one example of a local ordinance that forbids all films not passed by the national board. Vaudeville, or some between-the-acts entertainment is given in many places, but opinions as to how it should be dealt with vary. The subject of matrons is worthy of discussion, and local licensing of exhibitors seems to be the preferable.

"The claim that there is police supervision comes from twenty-one, chiefly governmental correspondents, while twelve places report, through citizens, that such supervision is nil. Evidently something needs to be done here. The twenty who claim that the boards of health do their duty are mostly city officials. Eleven outside observers say no. This, too, demands attention. The sixteen who claim that the laws as to children are enforced are largely city officials. Evidently in some places the laws are a dead letter. The ten persons who advise admitting children in the afternoon evidently want also the afternoon plays safeguarded for children. Apparently, we are not advised to tackle the problem of Sunday opening.

"In fine, we have here some light as to facts, and some guidance for action. It is quite evident that no law can be devised that will please everybody. It is also evident that when we have devised a law and seen it enacted, our duties will not be completed. A number of correspondents adjure us to awaken and to guide public opinion. That means a permanent work, requiring vigilance, tact, enthusiasm and some money.

"There seems, therefore, to be three duties before the commission: (1) To get more light upon all points not so far reasonably settled by this inquiry; (2) To frame and cause to be passed a bill, and (3) To establish a permanent agency for watching and influencing the future of moving pictures in New Jersey."

Discussion on the Report.

The discussion on the above report was limited mainly to the questions of censorship, the licensing of exhibitors and operators, the employment of matrons and advertisements and posters. Several resolutions were adopted, and the report and the resolutions were turned over to the executive committee with power to act. The question as to censorship was settled by Mrs. C. B. Alexander, of Hoboken, who pointed out that inasmuch as over one hundred films were produced weekly, the censoring of them would require a person to sit in a theater nearly ten hours a day for six days a week year in and year out. Not even the salary of a high-priced school teacher would command the services of a person who had the intelligence, education, tact and morality that would enable them to do this in a proper and acceptable manner. She suggested, and it was unanimously adopted, that the executive committee get legal advice as to the constitutionality and practicability of putting into the new bill a clause saying that "No picture shall be shown in New Jersey that has not been passed by the National Board of Censors." As to licenses, it was resolved that the executive committee should investigate licensing by state, by local authorities, and by both state and local authorities. It was suggested that the problem might be best met perhaps by having a local license, but a uniform state requirement, as one of the difficulties of the present situation is that a license valid in a given city or county is valueless in any other city or county. As to matrons, the executive committee was instructed to get all the light on the subject that they could. And, lastly, as to posters and advertisements, on the motion of Mr. Louis F. Blumenthal, it was resolved to embody a clause in the law requiring all such to be actual reproductions of scenes in the films they advertise.

The meeting then adjourned.

Universal European Company Home

Julius Stern Brings His Company Back with Valuable Film and New Ideas.

THE Imp Company that made "Ivanhoe" and many brilliant photoplays under Herbert Brenon during the past summer is at the Eastern studio again. When the North German Lloyd steamer Kronprinzessen Cecilie docked at 8 o'clock in the morning, on Tuesday, October 28, Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal Film Mfg. Co., with Mrs. Laemmle and the children, and many officers of the company, including Mark Dintenfass, manager of the New York studios, were on hand to greet Julius Stern, manager of the Universal's European company and his players who have been spending the summer taking pictures in English, French and German backgrounds. It will be remembered that this company left New York last July and has been attracting a good deal of most favorable attention by its lavish methods of production and the fine results obtained, especially with "Ivanhoe."

Julius Stern.

As soon as Mr. Stern and his company could be gotten off the ship, Mr. Laemmle and party hurried them to the studios, which were decorated with flowers and fitted up in gala array. Mr. Stern was then presented with a pair of beautiful cuff links from various actors and employees of the Eastern studio, the speech of presentation being made by Bob Daly. These links have Mr. Stern's name engraved on one side and a cluster of diamonds on the other.

Manager Stern is very well satisfied with his summer's experience. Among the films that were successfully taken (not counting "Ivanhoe") were: "The Child Stealers of Paris," and "Absinthe," a striking melodrama in which King Baggot and Leah Baird play the leads. Neither found it an easy picture to play. King Baggot is said to have lived in the slums alone for a week in order to get the realism of expression, costume and gesture needed, and Leah Baird fainted under the sustained effort required in portraying her part. In France, Mr. Stern studied the different manufacturing plants, and especially interested himself in photography. He thinks that European photography has heretofore been a little better than ours on this side; but he is determined that the disadvantage shall not long exist. He has brought over with him one of the best Parisian camera men, Mr. Barliter, who has already shown a great capacity for getting pictures under unfavorable conditions of weather.

While the company was in France it was Herbert Brenon's fluent francaise that saved the day for them. They could get and use the best French talent when needed. In Germany, Manager Stern, who speaks the language very readily, was the producer's interpreter. Of their German pictures, Mr. Stern mentioned, "Time Is Money," and said that for making this a steamer was chartered and that one of the Zeppelin air ships was taken in it. Fifty prominent German players were employed for this production. "Love and a Lottery Ticket" was also taken in Germany, as was "Love and a Throne," a romantic melodrama in which William Shay plays a foreign prince who falls in love with an American girl.

Manager Stern says that a six story building has been taken exclusively for the new Universal offices in London. The market is "open" there, and so three projecting rooms are needed and are in use all the time. A tea room has been fitted up, and those who are looking at film can have luncheon without leaving the building. A new office has also been opened in Berlin, on Friedrich Strasse. Mr. Stern was certainly delighted with the way "Ivanhoe" "took" in the English market. On the day it was released, twenty-two houses were showing it and these for seven days running. Other copies were sold later.

BIG ADVERTISING MELON TO BE CUT.

Universal Film Manufacturing Company Announces the Beginning of a National Advertising Campaign to Cost a Quarter of a Million Dollars.

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company of New York City, as briefly mentioned in the Moving Picture World last week, announces the beginning of one of the largest and most aggressive national advertising campaigns ever undertaken by a motion picture manufacturing enterprise. In accordance with a resolution adopted by the Universal board of directors at a meeting held at the Mecca Building, New York City, on Tuesday, October 28th, the sum of $250,000 has been appropriated from the net surplus of the company, to be expended on a national campaign of advertising. A contract has been entered into with the Witt K. Cochrane Advertising Agency of Chicago, whereby that firm will handle all details of the campaign, which is designed to cover magazines, newspapers, billboards and street cars, and kindred media. No legitimate vehicle of publicity will be overlooked in this campaign to educate the people to a just appreciation of the superior worth of the Universal program.

An interesting feature of the announcement is the fact that it is quite outside of the regular appropriation for advertising in the motion picture trade journals, which will be in no wise affected by this supplementary campaign. Coming as it does from the net surplus, it is a strong testimonial to the belief of the Universal stockholders in the superior worth of Universal films, and their preference for a national advertising campaign rather than larger dividends.

The announcement of this great campaign was received with great enthusiasm by the film exchanges handling the Universal program, the respective managements appreciating the fact that both their customers and themselves will profit by the Universal's vast expenditure on the lines suggested. Scores of telegrams and congratulatory letters are being received by the officers of the company in the Mecca Building, New York City.

MIDGAR'S ANIMAL FEATURE.

The exhibiting rights for Greater New York on "How Wild Animals Live," with an option on some additional territory, have been purchased by a syndicate. It is a six reel feature accompanied by a lecture, and is being marketed by Midgar Features, who state that no matter what arrangements are finally made with the exhibiting company, they will absolutely protect all present and future owners of exclusive territory.

A MACE PICTURE IN RECORD TIME.

Fred Mace claims the record for turning out a full reel picture. Mr. Mace has been hurrying up matters so that he may get away to the Pacific coast for his winter's work. "Fred's Waterloo" was made in four hours. There were five interiors and nine exteriors. The staging was simple, which accounted for the speed. The picture is said to be a good one. There are skeptics who will want "to be shown."

B. Nichols Talks

The London Film Handler Discusses European market—Predicts a Change in American Methods.

B. NICHOLS has been here again, also he has gone again. About the time you find that the big world-market film handler has arrived, he is in the process of saying his good-byes, for he does not stay very long.

"I did not come over for anything in particular," he said, "but I like to keep in touch and the best way is to drop over here now and then and see how things are going. The thing that most impressed me this trip is the increasing number of handsome houses going up in New York. Your local exhibitors should be very grateful to the late Mayor Gaynor for making possible the erection of more adequate places of exhibition, but I refer more particularly to the still larger houses that class under the regular theater laws. For many years New York was far behind London, but they are making up for it now.

"I have not added nor sought to add to my string of representations. I have added several European makers to my list because I believe that for the present the European product will be much more in demand than the American made film. The European maker puts much more story, per reel, into his product than most of the American manufacturers; he spends more money on the production and he takes more time and so is able to exercise greater care, with the inevitable result that his multiple reel subjects are more in demand than the two and three reel subjects sent from this side, too many of which are no more than good one reel stories padded with additional action but no more than one reel of plot.

"For a long time I fought for the one reel subject, contending that this would be the backbone of the business, but I have had to change my mind. The multiple reel attracts more attention from the exhibitor because his patrons demand the larger subject and because it is easier to fight competition with one big subject than with three to six single reel subjects.

"I know that over here the one reel is still in great demand, but it is plainly to be seen that the multiple reels, particularly those coming from abroad, are commanding the greater attention, and I do not believe that twelve months from now will see many one reel subjects being made either by the licensed or independent manufacturers here. More than that, I might add that the one reel subjects will not be held within the rigid thousand foot length, but will run whatever the story demands. It stands to reason that the fourteen hundred foot subject, or even the eleven hundred foot subject, cannot be as good when reduced to an even thousand feet. It is not possible to acceptably replace a hundred feet of essential action with a five or ten foot leader.

"Another change that seems to be coming is the gradual dropping of the reels exploiting some famous dramatic star. The picture patrons are less interested in the dramatic star than in the favorite players of the camera stage. Take, for example, the filmed production of Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson's 'Hamlet.' He was easily the least effective player in the cast; not because he is not a good actor, but precisely because he is and because he insisted upon using the technique of the dramatic stage when he played before the camera, and fitted the gesture to the speech, as Shakespeare advises, instead of suiting the gesture to the action as advised by the director. Perhaps an even better example, to draw from English productions, would be Arthur Bourchier and Miss Violet Vanbrough in Macbeth. That was a most sumptuous production, yet the effective work was not done by the stars but by the photoplayers employed in their support. These expressed the story in action where the stars adhered to stage methods, yet Macbeth, of all the Shakespearean dramas, seems to lend itself most readily to camera production since here the action is more pronounced and the play is not so dependent upon the poetry of the lines.

"In a word, fewer, bigger and more careful productions are what is needed and what will be supplied, and eventually I look to see the photoplay theaters divided into classes; the comedy house, the melodramatic house and the straight dramatic house, precisely as is now the case with the houses devoted to the spoken drama.

"Melodrama seems to have the call at present and the livelier sorts of comedy are in demand, but the day is rapidly passing when any thousand foot film of action, with more or less plot, will be regarded as an acceptable offering, and until the generality of American manufacturers waken to a realization of this fact, the European produced films will have the best of the sale in the World market.

"This means, I think, that less money will be spent on single reel subjects and more money and care and thought put into the multiple reels; not the two or three reel subjects, but the five to nine or ten thousand foot subjects that are made such a length because every foot of the film is needed to carry the story." E. W. S.

"The Child Stealers of Paris"

The Imp European Company Produces a Single Reel of Deep Human Interest—Beautiful Backgrounds.

By George Blaisdell.

THE third release of Herbert Brenon's European Imp Company is entitled, "The Child Stealers of Paris." It will be released November 20. The story is based on a phase of Paris life — repellent, to be sure, but actual, nevertheless — the kidnapping of little ones and sending them out to beg. "In the low parts of Paris disreputable outcasts rent stolen children to beggars at a daily rate," will read one of the sub-titles in this picture. Those who see this fine production may not realize that Mr. Brenon went into these same "low parts" of the French metropolis for some of his scenes. It will be conceded that the types are chosen with excellent judgment. The beggars are not actors, but just what they seem. There is one exception, of course; that is the child who proves to be one of the leading characters in this remarkably pretty story.

The backgrounds of the picture constitute one of its chief factors. They are selected with care and with an eye to artistic effect, and are finely photographed. There are scenes in a beautiful park and in the Champs Elysees, at the head of the latter the great Arch de Triomphe showing. There are views of the Bourse and the Louvre. The story is simple, but, nevertheless, it holds. It has the vital essential of human interest, or, as our script professors term it, heart interest. It is of a husband and wife who separate. A few years later the husband is a successful financier. The wife comes to Paris on a visit, bringing the child the father has never seen. The little one is lost. It falls into the clutches of a child stealer and is rented out to a beggar. On the street the little vagrant attracts the attention of the banker. He buys the little one and carries it home to his great, lonely mansion. Where before there had been desolation now comes sunshine. The distracted mother keeps up her quest. Looking through the iron fence she sees her child. In a moment she is with her. The reunion of the father and mother follows.

King Baggot splendidly portrays the banker. One of the best of his scenes is where he is talking with the child in front of the great palace. Sitting beside the reviewer when he saw the picture was Mr. Brenon. "Can you conceive that situation as it was?" asked the director. "King is talking English and the child is speaking in French, yet between them there seems to be perfect understanding." Miss Leah Baird plays the mother. It is a tender, sympathetic interpretation. The scene between the two principals, as the child brings the mother to meet the man who has befriended her, is dramatic and treated with consummate skill. It is a situation that strikes right to the heart.

There are those who insist that a story cannot be told within the limits of a thousand feet of film. Such pictures as this will always serve as a standing refutation of such an assertion.

HITE PLANS SURPRISES.

President Hite, of Thanhouser, has several surprises in store for the theaters in the way of feature productions. All of these productions will be of many reels, containing tremendous casts, and stage stars will be featured as well as film ones. "Thanhouser big productions," is the name that has been hit on to describe the "surprise" pictures to the public. An innovation in renting them has been determined on by President Hite. Exhibitors who like the "big productions," will be enabled to have them "first-run" exclusively in their districts for the term of a year, under contract. It is the first time a regular-release manufacturer has ever so issued features that an exhibitor could get them under a "protection" clause.

"LEAH KLESCHNA" FOR FAMOUS PLAYERS.

The Famous Players Company has secured the rights to the famous stage success "Leah Kleschna," in which will be presented the celebrated actress Carlotta Nillson. No other production of the Famous Players, with the possible exceptions of "Tess of the D'Urbervilles" and "The Count of Monte Cristo," has won such distinction on the stage, and through a strange coincidence, like "Tess," it has been one of Mrs. Fiske's greatest dramatic triumphs. The film production bids fair to surpass the original, because of the greater limitations of the oral stage for scenic and realistic effects. In the film version the scenes on the burning vessel and many other thrilling effects on the sea and in the general outdoors can be realistically portrayed, whereas in the drama they can only be described verbally. The production is scheduled for release on December 10th.

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADE

Cheap Picture Programs Climaxed in Dayton.

THE Majestic Theater, Dayton, O., is out-Heroding Herod in the matter of cheap picture programs just now. I have before me a clipping from a Dayton paper, in which there appears a glaring and attractive two-column advertisement of the theater mentioned. A "bromide" underline, immediately beneath the heavy gothic type devoted to the name of the theater, reads: "The better class of pictures for the better class of people." A little farther down and the great catch-line appears—five cents, the numeral 5 being white-sunk in a heavy field of black.

"Seven reels every day—never less, often more" is the next line, and immediately after is this paragraph: "Just think! Seven reels of exclusive pictures! Every picture shown at the Majestic is exclusive, which means not only first run, but that every picture thrown on our screen is the first choice of the picture market and can be seen at no other theater in the city of Dayton." Then, reminding readers that the General Film Company's exclusive service has been secured, and giving a list of licensed manufacturers, the advertisements point out that "The best pictures of the companies mentioned, selected by the board of directors of the General Film Company, will be seen at the Majestic only, and cannot be seen in any other theater in Dayton."

In addition, it is announced that all the Warner's Features and all of the product turned out by Daniel Frohman's stars have been contracted for. The program for the ensuing week is next given, Saturday's program showing that nine reels are offered, Sunday's eight and Thursday's and Friday's eight.

Every day, except Saturday and Sunday, until 7:00 P. M., the admission is five cents; nights and Saturday and Sunday afternoons the admission is ten cents, and children are admitted at half price at all times.

Comment is really unnecessary in this case. The owner of the Majestic is "hogging" the entire city of Dayton. Is there not a way to protect the many against this one man? Are means lacking to prevent this outrageous demeaning of moving pictures? While it may be hopeless to expect common sense from the management of the Majestic, surely it is not impossible to curb such management so that the interests of competitors, long in the business, may be protected, and the proper standing of moving pictures be maintained.

Buffalo Bill Pictures Finished.

Major General Nelson A. Miles passed through Chicago on Friday, October 31, on his way to Washington, after spending two weeks re-acting the Battle of Wounded Knee, under the moving picture camera. He was aided by Major General Lee, General Baldwin, General Mans and General King, who participated in the famous battle. The films are to be a record in the War Department at Washington, and will be used to enlist recruits for the army. The pictures were taken in the exact location of the battle, and were directed by General Miles.

The Battle of Wounded Knee is only one of the Buffalo Bill series that were taken out in the West under Director Theodore Wharton, of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company. Mr. Wharton and the Essanay expert camera man, Mr. Hargan, are still on the ground, in South Dakota, completing some of the smaller details of the big production.

V. R. Day, manager of Essanay, who had general superintendence of the forces—military, Indians and actors—left Pine Ridge for Denver, October 31, and is expected to arrive in Chicago, Saturday, November 8.

It has leaked out that the Medicine Hat man doped out some fierce weather during the four weeks' time occupied in taking the pictures. Ice cake for ordinary ablutions was the general rule, and the only chance for a bath was to take a skate a la nude.

Operatic Diva in Animal Pictures.

A Berlin cable to the Chicago Tribune states that lovers of moving pictures soon will be able to see Emmy Destinn singing operatic airs in a cage of lions to the piano accompaniment of the woman who is the tamer of the animals.

The rehearsal recently drew a crowd of theatrical people and other prominent persons to a forest in the outskirts of Berlin, where Mme. Destinn and the pianist entered the cage.

While the moving pictures were being taken a lion reposed gracefully on top of the piano, peacefully switching his tail, two feet from the singer. Other lions squatted unconcernedly around watching the tamer seated at the keyboard.

The Difference Between Tweedledum and Tweedledee.

In my last letter there appeared an article showing that Major M. L. C. Funkhouser, second deputy superintendent of police and censor of Chicago's morals, had barred certain moving pictures intended to give instruction on the hesitation waltz, the turkey trot and the tango. Since then the major has seen these dances performed by adepts and blame for the censure of these dances has now been placed upon the dancers and not upon the dances.

It all happened in the Grant Park Building, in South Michigan Avenue, the other day. The actors in the test performance were Alvar L. Bournique, master of dancing, and Miss Helen Paris, his assistant.

As the two, white-gloved professionals glided rythmically before the censors, there grew a wonder why any one ever should have found fault with so beautiful a dance as the tango!

"Beautiful!" sighed Major Funkhouser.

"Every one can dance the tango," declared Mrs. Gertrude Howe Britten, a well-known reformer, who was a spectator. "It is a beautiful thing."

It was Major Funkhouser's idea. His policewomen have been grappling with the tango problem for months. They have gazed upon its figures with mingled delight and disgust. Where was the dividing line? Their brows wrinkled in vain. Then Major Funkhouser evolved his scheme. He would show them how the tango should be danced. After that they could place their ban upon a too violently capering couple. Bournique, who has taught Chicago dancing for many years, agreed to stage the exhibition.

"I will next show the hesitation waltz," announced Bournique.

The ten policewomen leaned forward. They had heard of this hesitation. Bournique coolly placed a white-gloved hand on the waist of his partner. Her left elbow rested like a snowflake upon the back of his right arm. Two feet separated the dancers. Back and forth they rocked to slow music, then paced leisurely about in time to the notes of "Dreaming." The group of women of the police contemplated the dance with pleased expressions.

How different when the same things are shown in pictures.

Members of Woman's City Club Probe Ventilation.

Six groups of members of the Woman's City Club went out on inspection tours of moving picture theaters Thursday night, October 30, to determine, if possible, the needs of the enforcement of the theater ventilation ordinance.

The women visited some of the principal moving picture streets of the city, taking in North Clark Street, Milwaukee Avenue, West Madison Street, South Halsted Street, South State Street and Wentworth Avenue.

That few of the theaters visited came up to the requirements, was the prevailing opinion of the investigators. Miss Amelia Sears, who was in charge of the South Halsted Street division, said none inspected by her group was properly ventilated.

The building committee did not touch on the ventilation ordinance at the meeting held Friday afternoon, October 31. It was announced, however, that the meeting on Friday, November 7, will be open, and that it will be devoted to the hearing of expert opinion on the ventilation of theaters. No other speakers will be permitted to air their opinions on that occasion.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Schuyler Colfax, of the Eastman Company, Rochester, N. Y., was in this city Monday and Tuesday of last week. Richard Brady of the Cine film department of the same company, passed through the city Sunday, November 2, on his way to St. Louis.

Harry J. Cohen, general manager of the exclusive service department, General Film Company, passed through the city on November 3, on his way from St. Louis to New York. Mr. Cohen reports exclusive service a big success everywhere, thus far.

* * *

William H. Swanson paid the city a flying trip Sunday, November 3. He returned to New York the following day.

"Tess of the D'Urbervilles" was shown at the Twentieth Century Theater, this city, one night last week. This fine picture subject was well advertised in advance by the management, with the result that automobiles were lined up on both sides of the street for a distance of over three blocks, making the scene look like a grand opera event. The Century is one of a chain of houses operated by Alfred Hamburger. Mr. Hamburger has the exclusive rights to Famous Players films in certain territory. His next special will be Mary Pickford, in "The Bishop's Carriage."

* * *

E. A. Copilovich, owner of the Colonial Theater, Wabasha Street, St. Paul, Minn., was in the city last week and called at THE WORLD office, where he renewed his subscription for the paper. The Colonial seats 350 people and an admission of five cents is charged. Mr. Copilovich reported excellent business with Universal programs, furnished by the Laemmle Exchange in Minneapolis.

OBSERVATIONS
BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

BEFORE the next political campaign rolls along it is quite likely the motion picture exhibitors will adopt a course of action whereby the flashing of stereopticon slides advocating the election of candidates for office will be barred. Such slides are not only instigators of trouble, but tiresome to the majority of audiences as well. Nothing more quickly checks the interest of an audience than the flashing of an advertising slide upon the screen. Of course, slides announcing attractions coming to the theaters and informing audiences of house regulations are expected. A few years ago some exhibitors reaped quite a harvest by flashing advertisements for business people until the public forced their discontinuance. The managers explained that the flashings only took up the time that the projecting machine operators required to make a change of reels, and for a while it was accepted. But, on the principle that "we pay our money and want our choice," the audiences soon came back with the argument that if the operator could flash slides between reels, and there was not sufficient time for illustrated songs, he should put on scenic views, or slides of some character other than the dry, commercialized type. A distinct objection against the advertising slides was that the people did not wish to pay for what they could see for nothing on the streets. There is no reason why the political slides should not also be relegated to the scrap heap. The managers of the theaters derive no pecuniary benefit from them. Many of them object to the displays, but are either cajoled into making them by candidates, or their friends, or compelled to do so by threats of some action against the house through political influence. In this respect, the ward heelers are quite active during the campaigns, and the ward heelers are out for the interest of their candidates—not for the patrons of the houses.

During the campaign just closed the manager of a theater situated in a locality where the drop of a hat is sufficient to start a roughhouse at any and all times was pleading with some ward heelers not to insist upon having the slides of certain candidates flashed. Personally, he had no objection. In fact, the house was at the disposal of the candidates. But the manager was convinced that the flashings would be like the hurling of defiance at a mob. By the same old tactics, known only to the recklessly determined campaign lieutenant, the manager was finally induced to recede from his position. The result was as he anticipated. With almost the first flash the respective champions seated in the theater got at each other, and the house was soon emptied of the better element. The manager says he was condemned for permitting the flashing of the slides and his loss of patronage during the remainder of the campaign was considerable. "What could I do?" he exclaimed in explaining the situation to a friend. "I would be a marked man if I held my original stand. It is easy for some of these influential people to get together and frame up a charge to break the license of your house. One of the arguments made against me was that other exhibitors were flashing campaign slides and my refusal could only be taken as antagonism to the party. It is for that reason I hope the exhibitors will get together to bar such slides and determine upon some action that will prevent us being forced to display them. As they tend to create disorder in a place of public amusement, I think the exhibitors have sufficient backing in the laws for what I suggest. What we want to do now is to be prepared for the next campaign and have that backing at hand when needed. Perhaps it would be a good idea to have a special ordinance."

While some exhibitors who had heard of this manager's troubles were discussing them, one asked if the flashing of election returns should be placed under the same restriction. A lively debate followed and ended with a majority sentiment in favor of the returns. Those favoring them held that such slides are sources of information, and thousands of people are influenced more or less in going to the theaters on the nights of elections by the expectation of learning the results of the various contests while comfortably seated, rather than being jostled about in the mobs that assemble upon the streets in front of the newspaper offices, or in other public places. As an additional argument in favor of the return slides, it was claimed that the effects complained of by the flashing of ante-election slides are not looked for in the flashing of returns, because conditions change. The inflammable character does not go to the theater for his information. If he has not reached the bottom of his last bottle before the polls close he takes a bee-line for the political headquarters, or joins the yelling, hooting and acrobatic crowds in front of the newspaper bulletins.

Among those who was a party to the John Doe proceedings on the slide question was a man who said he makes considerable money making slides during political campaigns, and, therefore, he was speaking against his own interests when favoring the exclusion of the slides in moving picture theaters; but he did so with knowledge that the political candidates have the same field open to them they had before the moving picture theaters came into existence. The use of the picture houses has been a matter of economy for the politicians. Let them make the public displays as they did in former years. "To be frank about the matter," he said in a confidential tone, "more slides were made then than now."

Report is current that department stores that have nurseries where mothers may leave their children while shopping are contemplating abolishing them. As the story goes, a child was taken ill in one of the nurseries and the mother could not be located. It was suggested she might be found in a neighboring motion picture house. The manager of the house was sought and, between reels, he announced the circumstances without giving the child's name. It is said nearly two dozen women left the theater and rushed to the store.

The story has not been authenticated, but it may be accepted as having more foundation than the work of some humorist, in view of the experience of a few moving picture theater managers in the city. One of them provided a place at the entrance to his theater where mothers could leave their children and carriages with caretakers. Many of the mothers remained in the place but a short time. They went shopping. Upon their return they paid another admission fee, went in to see how the babies were, and if they were all right the women left their packages in the carriages and went into the auditorium. The manager was of the type that expend their good nature to the limit to make money, but the nursery game proved too much for him. He received double admission fee from each shopper, but during the absence of each woman he lost the coin of two or three women on account of inability to accommodate the offsprings, so he figured that it would be more profitable to be less accommodating, and he dismissed the nursery force. His neighbors soon commenced to talk about man's inhumanity to woman and—well, he does not run the place now. Votes for women!

A lady recently called at a local motion picture studio and asked to see the "social worker" among the girls. The request almost staggered the manager. To use his own words, "I was at a loss as to what to say. My first impulse was to ask 'which one?' but I finally stammered 'I beg your pardon. Perhaps I did not get you right.'" The lady explained that she was a social worker and devoted her time to placing in employment girls coming to the city from the country, and looking after their welfare. Her reason for calling at the studio was that a number of girls had written her that the picture studios in the cities always have many vacancies for positions known as "extras," and before encouraging them to come on she felt it her duty to ascertain the nature of the position of "extra," the pay attached and the prospects of advancement. "I don't think I will encourage them to come on," the lady said, as she retired.

THE BEE (Apis Mallifica).

THIS film of the common bee by the Gaumont Co. will be a subject of great attraction in the schools as it teaches a most thorough lesson of a well known insect which has always been of interest. "As busy as a bee," has always been a proverb of activity, it is here seen in every fulfilment, with every justification for its origin and purpose. "As sweet as honey," is also a standard of taste for which we are indebted to the bee, and the source of that truth is again verified.

The film shows how the bees live in colonies of great numbers, varying from 50 to 50,000; one alone, "The Queen," having the power to lay eggs. It is interesting to see how this "Queen" is the object of the constant care of the "workers."

The Birth.

In the cells constructed by the workers the queen surrounded by her escort lays an egg. To feed the larva the bees gather pollen from the flowers of the field and garden. With its legs covered with pollen the bee returns to the hive and fills the cells with a mixture of pollen and honey; on the combs there is an unceasing activity. The pictures show how, in cold weather, the bees cluster together to keep warm; and, after twenty-one days from the laying of the egg the worker bee is born. An important series of pictures now shows the Bees on the Honeycomb.

Anatomy of the Bee.

The foot is seen to have a pair of claws and soft flexible pads; the wing which produces the sibilant sounds called buzzing; the sting with its lances and the poison secreting glands is seen fixed at the end of the abdomen, it is finer than the smallest steel needle yet exceedingly strong, and looks most formidable when enlarged upon the screen.

The Bee at Work.

After a short apprenticeship the young bee goes out to gather honey and pollen and is seen also to be a great pilferer from sugar and all similar products as well as from the flower. The honey is deposited in the cells as a provision for the winter. The meeting of two bees for the purpose of becoming acquainted is an incident of instinct in the larger insects. Probably this instinct is better shown when an interloper (any other insect than a bee), approaches the hive, the active attack is most thorough and violent, making the bees show their power in a most effective way. Like many of these educational films the subject is complete, there is nothing partial about it, making it at once an entertaining subject and a thorough lesson.

Revelations of the Microscope.

Although this is by no means a new subject, this latter treatment of it from the Eclair Studios will be well received. There are many new uses of this helpful magnifier which will arouse an increased interest among students and scholars. The first picture shows how one can see the dust on a butterfly's wing; this dust, or fine covering, is made very plain, as are also the hairs on a bat or mole. In printing the figures which adorn a French postage stamp or specimens of the finest type of printing are revealed in all their detail. The edge of a recently sharpened razor which, both looks and feels straight and smooth though sharpened to an almost invisible edge, under the miscroscope becomes like an irregular saw. In striking contrast to this, the edge of a blade of grass appears as regular as the most perfect saw.

The epidermis of a leaf, showing the respiratory organs, the threadlike algea of the marshes, the rapid growth of which is shown under the microscope. Other small weeds that give the greenish color to water in the marshes are also clearly revealed. The almost invisible pollen of a flower is made plain and clear. It is interesting to see how the water in which a bouquet of flowers has stood but only for a few days contains many animalculae. Comparisons are made which reveal the differences between the blood of a frog and other animals or even human blood. The point of the finest needle or the sting of a bee, or the still finer hairs of the stinging nettle are like rifle bayonets. The activities of the energetic ant, or the wood louce show tremendous efforts when magnified upon the screen. For geometrical form and beauty similar to the snow flake is a single drop of syrup, which crystallizes in the process of evaporation, ad infinitum. The wonders of the art of kine-microscopism are legion and their revelations will educate and please.

AMONG THE FISHES. THE STICKLEBACK (Eclair).

The life of the stickleback is an idyll. The unselfishness and devotion to offspring, which is usually attributed to females of all animals, is shared by the male stickleback. At the season of the year when the thrush makes her nest in the bushes, the stickleback, in his particular domain, seeks a home for his future family.

The stickleback is a nest builder very much like a bird; indeed, he, in many respects, resembles the dove in his home-building and family-raising characteristics. Having penetrated the weeds as far as the selected spot, he is seen turning round and round, thus rapidly making a circular opening. Now, in order to strengthen his little home, the stickleback goes in search of tiny portions of vegetable matter; seizing the materials in his mouth, he carries them to his hole, leaning upon them with his body, and pressing them into shape in the same way that birds do.

When the nest is prepared, the lover, arrayed in sparkling colors, darts into the midst of a group of females. With his delicate manoeuvers he leads his chosen bride to the entrance of his domicile; after many enticing leadings, the female decides to enter, and is shortly engaged in fulfilling the maternal functions of depositing her eggs. After laying her eggs, the female escapes through on opposite opening, leaving the male to fertilize the precious deposit. Alone, the father takes charge of his family; he brushes the eggs with his fins in order to get rid of slimy deposits.

Sticklebacks are terrible robbers of each other's eggs; in an unguarded moment the nest may be ravaged. If successful in driving off the bandits with severe punishment, the male stickleback again mounts guard over his offspring. At the time of hatching the young fishes measure scarcely a few millimeters in length. The male stickleback does not abandon his progeny until its spinal armour is sufficiently hardened to command respect.

The usual Eclair success attends this production; it is a revelation of one of the most interesting specimens of fresh water fishes. The details are of marvelous distinctness and many of the bird-like traits of this fish are, in themselves, singular lessons of special importance to the classes in natural history.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN

A Cry From Clinton, Iowa.

A LETTER bearing the signature of E. T. C. comes from Clinton, Iowa, as follows:

> May I venture a little criticism regarding incidental music to the "movies"? This is one feature that too many managers pay so little attention to, and which should be one of the first considerations; it should be impressed upon the musician to try and play incidental music that would fit the picture. To illustrate—"Ivanhoe" was presented here at the Royal Theater, and the accompanying music by Mr. H. A. Waters greatly enhanced the scenes and situations of this fine picture. The music was noticed and remarked by three-fourths of the audience the prevailing sentiment being that "it was worked out beautifully." Two weeks later another house showed the same picture and no attention was given to incidental music. In some of the most pathetic scenes rag-time was pounded out in a continuous jangle.—I wonder why some one has not come forward with the idea to send hints for incidental music to each film.

I have given but portions of the letter. The rag-time piano player is still with us, of course, but the "Lily Limpwrist" who plays nothing but this sort of thing is happily growing scarcer. As to the idea of sending hints for music incidental to films, that has been done by some producers for a long time, and very often special music is published for some of the more pretentious pictures. The Vitagraph Co. publishes special music, and the Edison Co. is arranging to send instructions as to the nature of the music for their pictures. The fault lies less with the producers than with musicians—and possibly with some exhibitors who care too little for the musical part of their show to avail themselves of their opportunities.

New York Orchestras.

The following is from H. J. G., New York:

> As a constant reader of the Moving Picture World I am much interested in your articles on Music for Pictures. I have followed the rise and development of the moving pictures into photoplays and, as a musician of twenty-five years experience, have watched the slow progress of the musical accompaniment to the pictures and am wondering how much longer we will have to be tortured by incompetent pianists and cheap orchestras before the producers and exhibitors will realize that the public is getting disgusted with the musical setting offered daily in the principal theaters here in New York. In London and on the continent managers appreciate the value of the complement of fine music and are employing large orchestras that play good music, intelligently chosen and synchronized with the picture. How much longer must we picture fans wait for our managers to wake up to the fact that we have ears as well as eyes, and that not all of their public is incapable of discriminating between good and bad music. We are hoping to see some manager of good taste who will give us one photoplay house in New York with a fine orchestra of capable musicians and a conductor who can give us a worthy setting to some of the really fine pictures the film producers are turning out. As the picture houses are now attracting an intelligent and refined class of educated people, please wake up, Mr. Manager, and give us some good music with them. We will appreciate it, and you will get your reward at the box office which is after all the most important.

I am too far from New York to make any comments on present conditions in that city, but whole visiting there a few months ago I attended two of the Broadway picture theaters a number of times. Each employed an orchestra of nine or ten performers, and both furnished a good grade of concert music. Though the conductor in each case took very little pains to accompany the pictures, I noticed the music was usually generously applauded even though, as happened a couple of times, when an overture was begun near the finish of one reel and ended somewhere in the next picture—the two pictures being entirely different character, and the overture ending, of course, in an inappropriate place. If the public was becoming disgusted, it took an unusual manner of showing it. This sort of orchestral accompaniment is not peculiar to New York City, but seems to obtain all over the country. Now it is a fact that the average audience likes to hear good music, and will applaud it in the picture theater, even though it may sometimes detract from the picture. Some people have little opportunity to hear good music outside of the picture theater, and I met several people in your city who attended these places solely to hear the music. My contention has always been that it is possible to choose standard works (not necessarily overtures and operatic selections), which can be made to fit the picture; sometimes but a single movement can be used, while often an entire number can be played providing it stops at the proper time. This usually implies going back to the beginning when the scenes of that character run longer than the music. Pieces like the much-used "Barcarolla" from the "Tales of Hoffman." and Dvorak's "Humeresque" and hundreds of similar numbers are well liked and are very useful in picture playing, and can often be employed in their entirety if judgment is used. Single movements from standard works—especially operatic numbers—are readily adapted, but this generally entails memorizing on the part of the musicians—something the large orchestras do not seem to take to kindly, though it is common enough with small combinations of two or four.

Memorizing is not "faking" by any means, and it is not a bad idea to have a small repertoire stored away in your noodle to jump in with on short notice. A little filling in of this sort will often make a big showing. I knew a leader who made it a point to "work up" one reel in each program; sometimes a comedy sometimes a drama, according to which offered the best possibilities for "showy work." The rest of the program was filled up with concert stuff, but one reel always drew the plaudits of the audience; and the members of the orchestra enjoyed the work, too. It was a change from the regular routine and kept them interested, as any one could make a suggestion if an idea occurred to him. And with a little practice of this kind the musician who really cares will become prolific of ideas. Why do not more leaders try this "working up" in detail, a single picture and play concert music for the balance of the program? They might thus have something to please everybody.

I Wonder Who He Means.

Friend Lane contributes something which ought to interest most of us. Here it is:

> My Dear Fellow Pianists: Have you time for a few minutes chat about our end of the game? If so I think we can mutually benefit the photoplay art. But if you are only waiting for the last reel to come on and for Saturday night's envelope, this article won't interest you, so light your cigarette and between puffs sympathize with yourself and bemoan the fate that compels you to work for a paltry 10 simoleans per. Has it ever dawned upon your perception that you are an artist and not a common laborer? For the photoplay in its making and in its production is art with a capital "A."
> The development of this art has been little short of miraculous and demands and obtains the use of the highest type of educated brains. All that is best in the histrionic art is utilized and the unerring eye of the camera has caught much which the mimic stage cannot imitate.
> Somehow music and pictures are associated together. The psychological reason is of little importance; it is the fact which most deeply interests us.

As pictures appeal to the intelligence so does music. The picture is the universal language of the eye, music the universal language of the ear. The photoplay carefully and artistically presented becomes a living thing, and the music should supply the voice. Are you supplying that voice or are you trying to be the whole show? Of course, you are familiar with the classics as well as the popular stuff of the day. You made good on the big time circuits—well, make good here. What's that? The manager doesn't appreciate you? Bosh. The average manager is a practical common sense business man alive to the demands of his patrons and if you make good he will see to it that your envelope is not aenemic.

How about that Biograph feature you had last week? Remember the brilliant two-step you played through the entire story—even during the pathetic scene of the dying child? Sure, you played it well—and you did more to destroy the atmosphere of the story than you were aware. Has it ever occurred to you that music can express every emotion in the whole gamut of human passion? Live in your picture; be one of the actors. Be all of the actors. Transfer their personalities to yourself. Laugh with them; weep with them; love with them and triumph with them. Never for an instant lose the atmosphere of the story, and your manager will be the first to recognize it and come across. Can that stuff about lack of appreciation. Now then, I would like to learn something, so sit up on your hind legs and talk back.

CHINESE PICTURE MAN VISITS KLEINE COMPANY.

One of the most interesting visitors at the Chicago offices of the Kleine Optical Company in many a day was Lung Yi-sung, an intelligent and wealthy Chinese now touring the world in search of information concerning American pictures and picture-makers which he can use to advantage in the new China. Mr. Yi-sung says that picture theaters in Shanghai do not open until nine o'clock and run until midnight; that the cheapest seats are 75 cents in American money and $1.75 for the highest. Mr. Yi-sung believes that a splendid opportunity exists in China for the same character of picture theaters that he finds here, and thinks that the remarkable interest in pictures evinced by his countrymen on the coast can be duplicated among the five hundred millions of his native land.

NAVAL SECRETARY DANIELS ADVOCATES PICTURES.

Secretary of the Navy, Josephus Daniels, addressing a thousand men at a meeting in Durham, N. C., urged the use of motion pictures in Sunday schools as a means of attracting young people. He favored modernizing church methods to increase popular interest in church work.

LOUISE HUFF—LUBIN INGEUNE.

Louise Huff.

She is called the "Kate Greenaway Girl of the Screen" because of her likeness to the creations of the English artist of the last generation. But she autographs her pictures Louise Huff, and under the name she writes "Lubin." When she skips into a picture she brings with her a pair of violet eyes, a mass of soft blond curls and a delicate oval of a face. Yet more than this she is five feet of tender, wistful charm and quaintness.

Louise Huff may be the heroine of a merry little comedy, or the devoted village girl who climbs a tree during the storm and fastens on some leaves in order that the dying miser's prodigal nephew may return to claim his portion before the last leaf falls, to satisfy his uncle's whim. She is always a lovable little body who might have been Nell or Dorrit in the days when Dickens found his characters in the streets of London.

Miss Huff is a product of the South's best, having been born in Columbus, Georgia, only long enough ago to bring her in her 'teens to sweeten the Lubin pictures. She says she's just an old-fashioned girl who likes to stay at home, when she can, and sew and play an old fashioned mahogany piano which used to grace the drawing room of her old home in Georgia. To think of Little Nell doing the tango would seem almost profane, but the Kate Greenaway Girl loves quadrilles and minuets with an occasional waltz for excitement. A breath of rosemary and lavender is wafted as she trips her dainty way into the hearts of the picture public.

BIG CONTRACT FOR KINEMACOLOR.

The final contracts and arrangements were entered into between the Progressive Investment Company, Frank T. Bailey and George H. Grombacher, of Portland, Ore., whereby that combination has contracted with the Kinemacolor Company of America for over three hundred installations and supplies of weekly film service in the States of Oregon, Washington, California, Utah, Nevada, Montana and Idaho. The first consignment of sixty of the new Kinemacolor Simplex machines were shipped this week. Balance contracted for are to be shipped in weekly installments.

This is undoubtedly the biggest contract for film service ever made in this country. The new combination in the West is composed of old-time moving picture exchange men and exhibitors, and the success of their undertaking with the natural color films is practically assured, as they have already thoroughly canvassed their territory and have ready for installation over two hundred houses.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Alive All This Time.

EVIDENTLY N. E. Chaney still lives, in spite of his long silence, for he sends in an idea that is anything but a dead device. To the contrary it is a simple but mightly clever scheme, and if we gave you three guesses and then six more you would still be up in the air, so we won't make you guess. Here it is:

He gets out a program for two weeks at a time and he ties a string loop to it. Do you get it all? Listen to Mr. Chaney:

> Just thought I would drop you a line to let you know that I am still "listening" to your Department. I never miss an issue and I must say that I have gotten many a good idea out of the "Advertisers" department. I am still pegging away at the same old stand and I regretted very much that I did not get to attend the meeting of the National League in your city, as I partially promised to attend. I am inclosing under cover a sample of program that I am using for "winter time" distribution. I find that it is about as good as I can get for a small city or rather country exhibitors, I believe they style them. You will notice that I have the two weeks' program issued at a time and I have my carriers attach the same to their front doorknobs by means of the cord attached. In bad weather the programs are so apt to get destroyed, soiled or even blown away before your patron gets them. There isn't any blow away to it by the means I use and they can't open the door to their home without my program walking in without any invitation. They can be suspended by the same cord from some convenient place in their sitting-room, so they can always know what "Chaney" has that night. Remember me to all of my old time program friends.

Now you get it. Some day follow your boys down the street when they are trying to make a distribution and see the programs or dodgers blown off the steps almost before they are put down. Then figure out the card scheme. Try and get into some of the houses and see the programs hung up for reference. And remember that the day and date is over every offering. The card is 3½ by 9½ and has the usual Chaney trick of telling a lot in a line or two. In the small towns and the suburbs of the larger towns we can imagine no more assured scheme of distribution. The loop is merely a length of common twine about sixteen inches long, knotted together and then looped through the hole punched in the card. This loop is merely hung over the doorknob. Try it some time, and right now is about the time.

On the Other Side.

V. H. Oxley, of the Grand Theater, Bradford, Pa., objects to a recent paragraph in this department and offers his argument.

> In the MOVING PICTURE WORLD issue of November 1, you reply to Sunbury, Pa., regarding the exceptions taken to the showing of "Quo Vadis?" in the regular theaters. You will have to come across with some better argument than "missionary work" to get managers in the picture business to realize that benefit is derived in such a manner. You say the pictures have changed from the trash of a few years ago; well, so have the picture theaters, and it would not be a poor guess in figuring that there are more good houses of the latter class than of the one-nighters. When a licensed manufacturer puts over a big one why should he go to the theatrical syndicate? Maybe you read in the "Variety" of October 17, that Klaw & Erlanger have thrown out the Kleine productions and will send out the K & E Biograph films. It is said that many managers "het up" at Kleine have omitted his subjects from their service.
> Your idea that theater showing adds to the prestige of the business is O K for the city—but ask the picture theater man away from the environments of your city of what advantage that is to him.
> It is a safe bet that you have started something.

We hope that we have started something. Let's look at it for a moment. Suppose that Klaw & Erlanger made a big production and after a time took it on the road. We'll say that it is called "Umph." Naturally the people who run theaters want the big Broadway success "Umph"; the little man in the small town who doesn't get it, as well as the big man in the big town that does get it. Possibly some of the small town man's possible patrons go to the big town to see "Umph" instead of staying in the small town to see "Gumph" that was the big town attraction three years before; yet a lot of the small town patrons go to see "Gumph" and wait until "Umph" is cut down to the small town basis before they get to that. In other words the big stuff goes first to the big houses that can handle it. After the big houses are through then the little fellows get their chance, but meantime they do not refuse to take Klaw & Erlanger's "Gumph" just because they are not permitted to also get the same firm's "Umph." There is some credit in being a part of the Klaw & Erlanger enterprises.

We didn't read "Variety" of the date mentioned, but as we are one of the two men who founded that sheet we know that the editorial policy has always been to print rumor as fact until the rumor is contradicted. In no case does the paragraph have a bearing on the case, even were it true, which is not the case. We said and we still believe that the presentation of "Quo Vadis?" "The Last Days of Pompeii" and other large productions in the regular theaters is a good thing for the small house and the small manager in that it gives him direct advertisement by making others realize the growth and improvement of the picture business.

Classing Up.

It would be idiotic to argue that George Kleine could make as much money sending the big production to every small town house for the money the small town house can afford when he has in "Quo Vadis?" one of the most important theatrical propositions of the current season. He can make vastly larger sums presenting the subject in regular theaters, and he will still have a good proposition in the reels for the smaller places after the big time is over, just as Klaw & Erlanger handle their theatrical properties, first as a Broadway production, then the dollar and a half houses, then the dollar houses and so down to renting the script on weekly royalty to the stock houses.

It is time that managers realized that the motion picture business has not been standing still, that it is growing bigger and better as time passes, and that slowly but with certainty there are arising class houses. It is inconceivable that the business should forever remain on the five and ten cent basis, just as it is inconceivable that there should come a time when there will be no ten-cent theaters. You can be a dollar man if you can handle dollar attractions in a dollar manner, but the owner of the dollar attraction would be a fool indeed to cut down the value of his property to a ten-cent basis for no good reason.

Mr. Kleine is in the business of importing film and supplying this film to the exchanges of the General Film Company, which in its turn supplies the high and low admission motion picture theaters. That fact should not be used as an argument to the effect that he should cheapen some other import merely to oblige his eventual customers.

The eventual classification of the motion picture business will show various grades of houses charging varying prices of admission just as at present you can see John Drew for two dollars or the Corse Payton stock for thirty cents. No "ten-twent-thirt" manager expects to show John Drew; why should the ten-cent house demand "Quo Vadis?" at first hand.

Mr. Kleine might possibly rent "Quo Vadis?" to the ten-cent houses and still show a small profit, but that is not the point. To do that would most assuredly ruin the value of the films as a dollar attraction or a fifty cent attraction or even a twenty-five cent attraction. It is not the cost, the actual value of the film as film, that enters into the proposition. It is the value of the subject as a theatrical property, and it stands to reason that a dollar property is worth more than a ten-cent property. The fact that a film can be made a dollar proposition helps the film as a ten-cent proposition. The exhibition of "Quo Vadis?" in the established dramatic houses as a theatrical attraction has helped every ten-cent house in the country by placing it in the same general class with the other dramatic ventures and taking it out of a class but a short remove from the old dime museum.

"Quo Vadis?" is not yet a ten-cent attraction, and it would be absurd to mark it down to a ten cent attraction until its value at a higher admission is exhausted. Meantime the small manager who cannot get the film most assuredly does profit by the fact that there are dollar attractions, but to realize that he must be able to see more than three feet beyond the shelf of his own box office.

Just get yourself braced for the fact that the business is no longer a "five and ten" proposition, and be ready yourself to be first a quarter and then a half dollar manager. Be able to think more than ten cents at a time. Lots of managers do right now.

And we'll send a cigar costing one dollar for one to the first man who can make us see that George Kleine or any other man is morally or legally bound to take all his eggs to one market or to sell chickens at the same price per dozen as he sells his eggs.

Mr. Bleich's Slides.

Here's a note from George A. Bleich, of the Empress Theater, Owensboro, Ky.:

> Because I feel that all things pertaining to advertising the pictures are of interest to you, by parcels post I am today forwarding a few samples of the slides I use in my houses, and you will admit that they are out of the ordinary.
>
> The slides are used for every feature, or film that is worth calling especial attention to. The players' cuts, you will note, show up strikingly well.
> A local concern makes the slides for me at a charge of 25 cents each. I can hand them copy and obtain the finished article in less than an hour's time.
> Should any of the fraternity be interested in obtaining them, I will gladly furnish the address. The concern should advertise in the World, and they will, no doubt, when their mind is made up that a field exists for just these slides.

The slides sent—and he sends half a dozen, are really high class work, both in the type selection, photography and general finish. They are made by printing the legend and then mounting half-tone pictures cut from the Vitagraph bulletin and elsewhere. The half-tone screen will magnify on the picture screen rather unpleasantly, but that is more or less of a detail. Any picture is better than none at all, and if there is a demand worked up they can easily get reductions of photographs. This is not a department for advertising wares, but we leave the address because we think we'll be doing a favor to some exhibitors. We would add that the six slides came through to us without a crack because they were properly packed.

Likes Wall Paper.

The management of the Angelus Theater, Spanish Forks, Utah, likes J. B. Love's idea of a wall paper dodger and writes:

> An idea stunt to use once. It would be hard to find a better one. We packed them in, thanks to THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD and Mr. Love.

Apparently Mr. Stallings has not found a lot of sample books handy, but has printed from the roll. (Mr. Love used sample books of paper, it will be remembered). Their text reads:

> LOOK
> We are tearing the wall paper from our walls to make room for the enormous crowds that will want to see
> SINS OF THE FATHER

It is surprising how a stunt like this will gain attention in a small town. With paper as low as six cents a roll, the cost of stock is less than a good white paper and the effect for once is vastly better.

Somebody in a Spanish Forks printing office deserves a word of praise for the composition of the advertisement. It is "big city stuff" in choice of type and setting; an exceptionally good bill.

The Red Cross Seal.

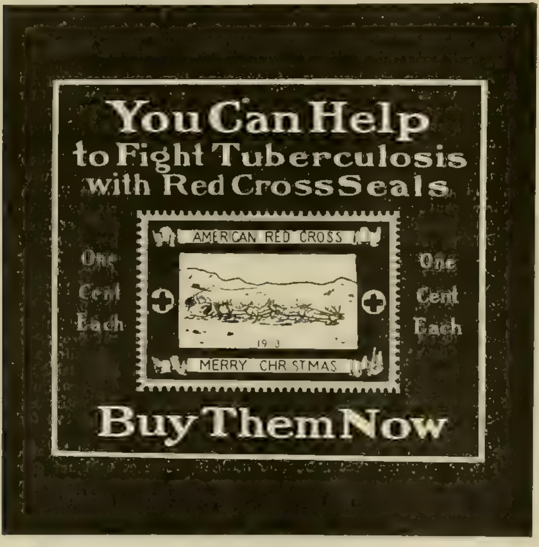
We show with this the cut of a slide that will be supplied you without charge for use in connection with the distribution of the Red Cross Christmas Seals. As usual the Edison Company will release a Red Cross Seal story to aid the campaign, and this year it will be a departure from the plea for open air treatment and be directed against the fake physicians and the fake cures that do such harm in preventing victims from taking proper treatment in time to check the disease. The previous stories have done a lot of good in increasing the sale of the Christmas seals, the receipts from which are devoted to checking the spread of the white plague, and they have helped the theaters both in the matter of attendance and in establishing the value of the theater as an educator.



Prepare for the coming of the release by placing the stamps on sale. If there is no local society in your town almost any physician can give you the address of the State organization or the same information may be had if you will send a return postcard to Philip P. Jacobs, 105 East 22d Street, New York City, the secretary of the National Association having the matter in charge. He will see that you get the slide and are supplied with stamps.

There is no more important problem facing this country than the prevention of tuberculosis, and any movement along these lines meets with popular support. Do not merely run the releases. Work up a campaign. Even in the small towns you can get the local health officers and physicians interested. Perhaps you can get some well known physician to lecture the subject, announcing that fact in advance. Start the sale of stamps early, running the slide with each run of the program. If there is a local society run another slide announcing that fact and giving the address. Tell as soon as you know, the date you will show the picture and try, if possible, to get the previous release, "Hope," which will give another aspect of the case. Boom it precisely as you would a feature reel, but in a dignified fashion. See the school teachers, the newspapers and the ministers as well as the physicians. Post yourself on the gravity of the subject and communicate your enthusiasm to others and you will not only have a bumper house for a couple of nights, but persons who look aghast at the picture theaters because they know no better, will realize that there is something besides battle, murder and sudden death to be seen on the screen. If your house is properly ventilated make capital of that fact, for good ventilation is the foe to consumption. Get a little personal advertising out of it. Fuller details of the story will be given when the Edison Company has completed the production, but meantime get the slide and the stamps and notify your exchange that you want the reel as soon as possible. You can swell your box office receipts and be doing a real good at the same time. There is no profit in the stamps, we believe, but the indirect effect is good, and it is possible that the local society will send someone to handle the stamps and relieve you of any care in this regard.

From Bryn Mawr.

The Bryn Mawr (Pa.) Theater had a Who Will Marry Mary night the other day and ran the receipts to double the usual taking, postcard portraits of Miss Fuller being the attraction. One hundred advertising cards costing $3 and 500 postcards costing $5 brought in $20 above the usual receipts for the weekday night, which shows a pretty profit. The advertising cards were cut into four strips and court plaster hinges gave a screen effect that not only enabled the cards to stand alone, but attracted attention to them. The cards were about 15 by 12 inches. Another extra advertised the star local baseball player as a lecturer on the world's series. A third exhibit shows a weekly program on a single sheet, a good display being given through the use of uniform type and an intelligent allotment of space. It is a very creditable bit of work, the titles running in 36 point, the lesser titles taking 12 point and these being the only black type.

Mr. Buzzell Did.

Here is a letter from R. W. Buzzell, of the Plaza theater, Northampton, Mass.

> Your little note in this week's issue wondering how many exhibitors were wise enough to book Kalem two-reel "Breaking Into the Big League" for the week of World's Series, started me going.
> I was one at any rate and I asked my exchange for it the same day that I read the notice of it in the World and very fortunately I had it the day the New York Giants won.
>
> I ran an Electrical score board every day of the World Series which by special wire showed every play made on the diamond with a red light for the ball, a green light for each runner and white lights for the field.
>
> This town is baseball crazy, so much so that the day of the opening game of the local club series every store, barber shop, saloon, drug store shut up and went to the game, and ever since I have been looking for an opportunity to get those fans interested in my theater.
>
> Well we ran this score board and broke even, but I have got about 100 of the strongest boosters for this theater as a result of it.
> The day New York won, as soon as the game was over, I invited them all to stay and see what kind of pictures the Plaza ran, and then I put on the Kalem, and when it was over the secretary of the local ball club got up and asked the audience for a vote of thanks for yours truly.
>
> I have at last accomplished something which I was told could not be done, that is to get out a program like the inclosure. Thanks to Mr. Scates, the manager of the General Film Co.'s Boston Exchange and the inauguration of a new booking system, I was able to do it. I am not extra proud of the looks of it, but when I think that I did not have the bookings until 8 p. m. Friday and had it ready for matinee at 2:30 Saturday, I think it isn't bad. Sorry to say that the mailing department failed to send me a copy of the October 18th issue of the World. My operator got tired of waiting for it to come and sent a card for it. Well if we do not get it we will have to buy it, for we cannot be without it.

Plazantries.

Mr. Buzzell punningly calls his program Plazantries. It is rather an awkward shape, a four page, five and a half by eleven and a half. Folding once again, getting a page half the length, would entail stitching, adding to the expense, but folding it twice more, railroad folder fashion, would give a sixteen page program with a page or two pages for each program, plenty of space for the vaudeville, one act of which is used, with a change twice a week, and still leave space for the general advertising.

If the present shape is adhered to, it would be better to give a page and a half to the program of film and half a page to the vaudeville. This will permit the daily programs to be separated from each other by cut off rule, making each day stand by itself. At present only the second page is given to the program, the third to the vaudeville and the back page to general house advertising. The films are all crowded and there is so much type that the eye regards it with dismay, while, on the other hand, the vaudeville acts look lonesome rattling around on a page all by themselves. With four days on one page and two days on half of the next, the display would attract the eye instead of repel it, and at the same time the condensation of the vaudeville announcement would not emphasize the scantiness of the offering.

It is a move in the right direction, but each program should be by itself and carry day and date instead of merely the day.

Skeletons come out of the closet in one of the announcements, which advertises that "Arthur Johnson, the Northampton Boy," will appear in one of the pictures. Pass that along to your own fans.

A Fashion Model.

Miss Alice Joyce, of the Kalem Company, has posed for some fashion pictures, and we are in receipt of a copy of the Jacksonville Metropolis (sent by Frank Montgomery, of course) giving her the center of a full page advertisement of one of the big stores. Mr. Montgomery says that credit is due someone and hints that it might be the Kalem press agent. It certainly is good work.

Somewhat Surprised.

WE are somewhat surprised to find E. J. Montagne lining himself up along with the novices in kicking about the treatment he has received. Mr. Montagne works on a newspaper, has sold scripts and gives other evidences of possessing intelligence, but when it comes to the hated editor he is just as foolish as yesterday's beginner. His letter is just as bad as the wail from the person whose letter was the cause of the "ground rules" article. The latter took exception to the suggestion that he was not playing the game in the proper spirit and came back with the accusation that we were truckling to a certain editor in order to sell our own scripts. Truckling be hanged! All we've sent that particular editor in the last year and a half has been two letters and a postcard and we got one letter and two postcards back. We are trying to beat some business sense into empty heads and we do not care whether the possessors of the aforesaid heads like it or not any more than we care what the editors think. Listen to Mr. Montagne:

> I read the two letters in the World last week, and believe me, they express my sentiments and the sentiments of everybody I know, to a T. Your comments on ground rules and all that sort of thing are very nice and clever and undoubtedly read with much pleasure by scenario editors, but if we writers concurred with you we would be in the same position now that we were in a few years ago when a script brought five dollars and lifting ideas was so common it was commonly practiced in most studios. Conditions are better today because a good many of us writers have had the nerve to kick, and kick good and hard, and conditions will continue to improve for the same reason, and not because some of us meekly say, "There's no use kicking. Things are rotten, I know, but those are the ground rules, and if you don't like it, get out." If the various editors of moving picture publications would lead in the fight, and enlist the support of the many Inquest Clubs in the country, within the short space of a year the lot of the scenario writer would be immeasurably improved.
> As your correspondents point out, one of the biggest evils to-day is the policy of holding a script three and four months and then returning it so mutilated that it has to be done over again. An editor ought to be able to tell within two or three weeks whether he wants a story or not, and if he don't, for the love of Mike why don't he send it back before the market goes dead on that sort of stuff. Last winter when the field was great for underworld stuff two firms—biggest in the country—kept one of my stories seven months. When it came back it had to be done over and then I learned, "there is no more market for that kind of story." Another of my stories took a trip to Europe with a director and returned at the end of three months. Still another hiked it to California with a director, who got fired and took my story with him. Should the firm worry about my script? Not on your life. I simply had to make another.
> Conditions generally are rotten, and you know it as well as I do. Some editors are princes and some firms try to do the right thing by us—but generally speaking, the scenario writer is the most poorly treated individual in the picture game today.

Just lately we mentioned to an inquirer that we had a script that had stuck with the Vitagraph from May 8 to September 5, being returned too late to be made this year. We burned no red fire. We put the script in the case and next spring it will start out again. If that is the Vitagraph method (and it is not the rule) and we want to do business with the Vitagraph (which we do not) the only thing is to send its winter underclothes along with the summer script, but it's no nice way to make a noise as though that was the only script we ever wrote or expected to write.

We are not trying to apologize for the editors. We are not pleading the cause of the manufacturers, some of whom have less system than our dog, who at least seems to know where he buries his bones. We merely want to persuade the writers who might make good that if they want to play the game they must be nice. Mr. Montagne overlooks a number of prompt and satisfactory sales to roar his head off about one delayed script, and he is the type of a lot of others who will not play the game right and who try to make it hard for those who are willing to.

If the editors dealt only with those willing to abide by the ground rules, naturally it would make things much better for that few. Our personal percentage of sales would be bettered if the others stayed out. That we are trying to save the chance for the others should at least argue our good faith, and to that we think we can add a longer experience than those who take issue with us.

It is not kicking that has made matters better. Therein Mr. Montagne errs. His kicks have had no great weight with manufacturers and editors who were doing business before Mr. Montagne kicked. The general trend of the business is better because editors and authors have learned better. There are still some of both classes in the kindergarten, but kicking isn't going to graduate them. That requires experience.

The Inquest Club.

The third sitting of the Inquest Club this season was held at its Morgue, September 27, about thirty-five being present, including Stanley Todd, who had a new and almost visible moustache to exhibit as the result of his summer's work. Miss Gene Gauntier had hoped to be present as a witness, but illness prevented, or rather postponed, that pleasure. The next quest will be held November 10, meeting as usual at the Savoy Theater.

Has Learned the Trick.

Editors are fond of saying that you cannot become a real author until you gain the "picture eye"; the ability to see the action play as it is written. That is one qualification, but first you must have something to see, and plot comes before development. This extract from a recent letter indicates perhaps the greatest asset of the writer:

> When I first started writing, to save my life I could not see more than one way to write a play, but now I'm beginning to see how, by twisting it around, I can arrive at many different conclusions. And that is just what is making it so fascinating.

That is the real delight in writing plays; to see how you can mold the idea to suit your fancy. The plot is no more than a bit of clay. The artist makes an exquisite statuette, the novice gets but a lumpy mass, and yet, no doubt, the artist got only lumpy clay when he wanted to model a horse. It was practice, plus inspiration and imagination, that made him an artist.

Generous!

For extreme generosity commend us to a company that writes:

> If you would accept three dollars for this idea we would be pleased to accept same. You seem to be able to write good stuff, and we would be pleased to be favored with more of your efforts that may meet with better returns.

They might have made it a five spot. Even ideas are worth something.

Chicago Wants Members.

Clarence Frambers, head of the Chicago circle, writes that the circle is composed of but four members. There must be more than four photoplay writers in Chicago who can be helped by mixing with other writers, when New Orleans can boast fifteen or twenty. Get busy, you Chicagoans, and meet up with your fellows. To save correspondence write direct to Clarence A. Frambers, 3223 West Polk Street.

And please note that Mr. Frambers says that his middle name is "plain A." There is only one other man we know with a single letter for a name: D-Cady Herrick.

If You Live in Mobile.

If you live in Mobile, Ala., a correspondent is anxious to start a branch of the Inquest Club there, after having attended a dinner of the New Orleans circle, where he discovered what a good thing this mixing with one's kind has proved. The name will be supplied on receipt of a stamped and self-addressed envelope.

Press Work.

Several writers have asked lately what we consider to be the best form of press work, suggesting their belief that a little publicity will greatly aid their sales of scripts.

There is only one form of publicity that counts and that is a studio identification. It does not matter how many times the professional papers print your name. The only thing that will help you sell a story is the elementary fact that other stories sold the studio have worked into good photoplays. The only thing that can help you with the photoplay public is your identification with good plays, and this is merely an extension of the first proposition. Don't study to get your name in the paper. Study to get your name on checks, for checks argue good stories and good stories argue more checks.

Figures.

Several correspondents of late have supplied the financial facts of their first year or their first few scripts, or something like that, but it does not seem to us that returns should be measured in terms of dollars and cents.

We have already spoken of a correspondent who quit writing partly because his return was an average of $1.83 a day, and there were others with varying figures. One man wrote that his first six months showed a loss of about eight dollars for postage and nothing sold; but was it a loss?

For the serious business of earning a living, some sort of education is essential. One goes to the kindergarten, to the grade school, to high school and perhaps to college. All of this takes time, yet we never hear a man figure that in learning to be a carpenter he spent eight years in school that did not bring him a single penny. He may not even figure the term of his apprenticeship, but the moment a man starts to write stories or plays he figures all the time spent against the earnings, regarding none of that time as his study period.

The man who spends eight dollars and took in nothing may have put his time to far more profitable use than another who in the same time has sold a hundred dollars' worth of work through some clever trick of plotting. The plotter comes to consider it all a trick and depends on his trickery to gain checks, where the plodder, who sold nothing, may be gaining through a study of his rejections a much sounder groundwork of technique that in some later time will enable him to outstrip the man of the earlier success much as the tortoise overtook the hare. It's not what you earn the first year that counts; it's what you are likely to earn in the long run, and the more careful the preparation, the more lasting the success will be.

Cutting Back.

Most playwriters are familiar with the cut-back or flash-back as a means of raising and holding the suspense, but comparatively few realize how convenient it is to get around minor difficulities when used in its simplest form. Just the other day we saw a script in which a mounted man goes over a cliff after being thrown from his horse. The horse rears back, but the man, who has just dismounted, keeps on going, and you see him fall the full hundred feet—which is apt to be discouraging to the actor who plays the part.

Using the cut the scene becomes very simple. The first scene shows the man riding. In the second he dismounts and goes over the edge of the cliff; which need not be more than three feet high. In a third a dummy is shot through the scene that shows the real cliff. In the fourth the dummy falls to the base of the cliff or the player rolls into the scene, the next shows a flash of the rescuer and we again come to the base of the cliff where the dummy, if one has been used, has been replaced by the actor. This gives a lot of scenes instead of just one, but since this is the way the action will probably be played, it is better to write it so than to leave it all one scene to be planned out by the director. It is just as easy to write and just as easy to plan and it gives the director far less trouble.

Another thing to be realized is that succeeding scenes need not be in the immediate vicinity of each other. A good example of this will be found in some of the Zulu comedies put on by the Lubin company last spring. Two of these show a beach with a boat landing and then the sandy jungle near the shore and all of them break from the native village to the wild. The village was built in the studio yard in Jacksonville and the jungle scenes were made at Pablo Beach, twenty miles distant, just as the boat landings were made on the St. Johns because there were no rowboats at the beach. By matching the action the scenes suggested that the players passed directly from one spot to the next and not that they were made on different days in locations far apart.

Theme Used Before.

In more courteous phrase a recent correspondent sought to prove that an editor was guilty of an untruth when he said a theme had been used before. The author sought to learn by whom the idea had been used and the editor could not tell, therefore the author decided that he had the editor in a hole.

This is not the case. Most editors have cultivated and retentive memories, but they do not charge their minds with dates and titles but with used plots. They may, perhaps, decide that an idea is like a recent Selig or was used by Vitagraph about a year before, but that is all they need to know and all they remember. The phrase sometimes is overworked, particularly where the checked rejection slip is used and the office boy does the marking, but most editors speak truly and sincerely when they put this stop order on a story.

Encore.

Come some more correspondents who complain that they cannot tell when closeup pictures should be numbered, therefore we take an encore on the matter and tell it again.

It is a simple matter to determine when to number scenes and when to insert, if only it is remembered that there is a special department for the making of inserts.

When a director gets a script he sends to the insert room a list of leaders and other inserted matter. This leader list covers absolutely everything that he is not going to make himself with the aid of his cameraman and actors.

It stands to reason that unless he makes it someone else must, so he lists everything from the title to tailpiece.

The leader room sets to work to make the inserts and he starts to make the rest. The leader room makes the title, the leaders and letters and all the inserts that do not require the actors or the scenery. If the script calls for a hand holding a locket, it does not matter whose hand is shown, so the leader room makes this. Perhaps the coat sleeve of the player is important, but the coat can be loaned to the leader room while the player is wearing other costumes, but if the hand is shown working on the combination of a safe, then it is not so easy to send the safe to the leader room, and the director marks this to be made by himself. In such a case it becomes a bust or close-up instead of an insert. Both the bust and the closeup are parts of a larger scene, but in the general acceptance of the terms, the bust covers less field than the closeup.

Every time the director makes a scene, bust or closeup, it is marked with a scene number, not in the order in which the scenes are made, but in the order in which the scenes should appear in the film.

The exposed negative is sent to the developing room and from there to the printing room. There prints are made and sent on to the joining room, where a young woman joins number two to number one, and number three to number two, and so on. If there is a leader after scene two she receives also a strip of leader. Usually the work is done from a joining sheet; a paper that might look something like this:

1—Parlor set—cut where father leaves the room.
2—Front of house—cut where father exits up street. Leader No. 1.
3—Office—to where young man speaks to father. Cut in leader No. 2. Cut where young man leaves office.
4—Office building—cut where young man goes up street.
5—Parlor same as No. 1—to where young man shows locket—Insert No. 1. Cut where young man exits.

Now, with this slip she knows just where to assemble the prints from the leader room and the prints from the director. Each scene that she gets from the director must be numbered in consecutive order that she may know which is which, and it follows that each scene to be made by the director must also be numbered in consecutive order, but that the leaders and inserts can be numbered from the new slip the director makes out and sends to the leader room.

Number, then, as scenes, all scenes that directors must make, giving but one scene number to a scene, no matter how many cut in leaders or inserts there must be, remembering that the director must make all scenes and all busts that show much action or which must be made in the settings employed, instead of the leader room.

Your Choice.

Which would you rather do, write a lot of scripts and sell none, or write a few and sell them? Then take more pains with those few scripts, instead of emulating Marc Edmund Jones and his seven scripts in seven days. Jones admits that he has not sold all seven yet, and we do not think that he will. Neither will you.

Getting Help.

The other day we sent an idea man to an author and presently came a letter: "Blank sure showed me what action means. For a while I was writing around a motif. Now I'm writing plots."

We cannot send the ideas man all over the country, but we can send the message, and that is this:

No matter how clever your story or how interesting the idea may be, unless the story is developed in interesting action, the script will fail.

This writer had been working for so long that he had slipped over into the fiction division again. He was writing a lot of pyschology, but precious little action and trusting to the idea to atone for the lack of movement to the plot.

And he is not the only one by a whole lot of chalk marks. There are plenty of the three and four year veterans who are doing precisely the same thing. They have been writing for so long that they have forgotten again the need for telling the story in vivid action.

In current slang, "How is it by you?"

Inquiries.

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of addresses to which photoplays may be sent will be mailed on receipt of a STAMPED AND ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of a script.

B. B.—Miss Asta Neilsen appears only in special releases manufactured abroad. Her films are seen but seldom over here. We cannot locate the Biographer. Too old. Your suggestion that the location where films were made be given is an interesting one, but "Hamlet," for instance, "made in Los Angeles," or "Romeo and Juliet, made in New Rochelle," would not be very convincing. Most assuredly you must send stamps if you wish your manuscript returned. Stick them on a proper sized envelope addressed to yourself, instead of sending loose stamps.

D. D.—Miss Sweet is working in New York at present. Mr. Cooley is with Biograph now. We are not certain about the other player.

A. A. W.—We have already said we liked the Esenwein-Leeds book. What you asked was, whether it was a better book than the one we wrote, and we asked what sort of an answer you expected to a question like that. If you are interested "heart and soul" in your work, you'll keep on writing. Success seldom comes in six or eight months. On the other hand, how can we tell whether you will succeed or not? An Answers Man is not a fortune teller—what?

A. I. O.—The Eastern Universal is buying very little at present. It reads for all except Eclair and Crystal. Your story seems to make too heavy a demand on the studio. Vera Cruz and Annapolis are a long distance apart, and even scenery like that around Vera Cruz is too far. Better simplify the scene plot if you would sell.

RICHARD ROE—We do not reply to questions as to relationships. Cannot locate the player you want. They come and go too rapidly to keep track of.

A. S. H.—A synopsis of Essanay's "The Cat's Paw" (two words), was printed in the issue dated Dec. 21, 1912, the film being released December 25. This is a year after yours mighht be expected along; perhaps it is not the same, but it is the only one of that title by that company in that time. Mention of the circle presently.

C. N. D.—We cannot give identities by mail. In "Cohen's Outing," the characters you ask for are Cohen, Chas. Avery; Mrs. Cohen, Miss Alice Davenport; Kelly, Wilfred Lucas. Mrs. Kelly is not known to the Identifier. Fatty, or Pudge, in "Fatty's Day Off," was Roscoe Arbuckle. Jack Gurley, the auto driver in "For His Loved One," was played by Lamar Johnstone.

RUBEENA—Didn't we reply? Listen. You can come to lunch, too. That squares it? Eagle Eye was working with the Biograph last we heard.

R. J. H.—Nix on that Yukon Kid stuff. It takes Lubin about a week to pass a script unless it is held to wait action. Do not know about the American, but they are usually prompt. Watch the paper for the Chicago address. Probably this issue. Ask for names, not leads, and then we'll know that you mean what we mean.

A. C. P.—The school sold out after the professor was arrested. Do not monkey with copyrighted stories. They do not sell unless you can offer the copyrights, and then use of the original author's name. You tell a two-reeler by instinct. There is no hard and fast rule. You merely know, when you have had proper experience, that you have enough plot and action for two thousand feet.

MADAM X—Sign a name. Cyril Gottleib was the Orphan of the War. Roscoe Arbuckle is the Keystone Fatty. The K-B Identifier thinks it was Miss Betty Harte who played the role.

Question No. 6.

BEST answer will be published and names of others sending in replies of excellents will be published in the "Roll of Honor."

Explain how the bearings of a motor or a generator are lubricated. Illustrate the same with sketches.

Supposing you used a very heavy oil, such as engine cylinder oil, for lubricating motor or generator, what might be the effect in cold weather? Supposing one of your generator or motor journals got hot and you knew there was plenty of oil, what would you attribute the trouble to?

Outside Shutter and Flicker.

For a good while past there has been quite a large amount of correspondence, and an insistent demand for the explanation of the following proposition: Operators and managers have noticed that two machines, each practically identical to each other, and each projecting with the same amperage, on the same kind of screen, deliver very different results. One will be practically flickerless, while the other will produce a very pronounced flicker. The why and wherefore of this has been demanded of the editor hundreds of times. He has hesitated about answering through the Department through fear of embarrassing machine manufacturers. However, the time has come when this matter must be made clear, and either manufacturers must adopt the method I shall suggest, or else operators must learn to match their own lens with a shutter of proper dimensions. The trouble is only present where outside shutter machines are used, and it is primarily due to the fact that the shutter which will deliver the best result when working in conjunction with, for instance, a six-inch e. f. objective, will produce a very pronounced travel ghost when working with a short objective, say, one of 3½ e. f., whereas the shutter which will eliminate travel ghost with the short e. f. lens will produce flicker regardless of what kind of a lens it works with.

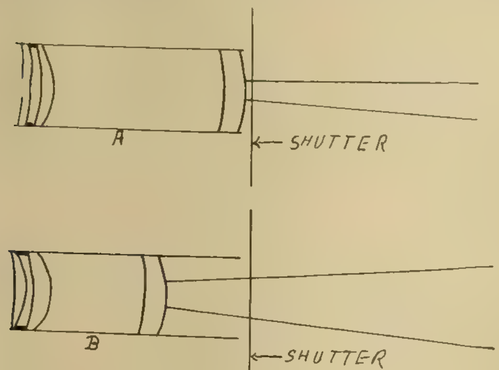

FIG 1

The reason for this will be understood upon examination of A and B, Figure 1. A, represents the long focal length lens. It will be observed that the front combination of this lens sets right out at the end of the barrel and that the light ray goes out with very little spread. In B we see the short focal length lens in which the front combination sets back a considerable distance from the end of the lens barrel and the light rays spread very much faster than the rays in Fig. A. Now, a little reasoning will show you (a) that the shutter can be set right up close to the lens in A, Figure 1, thus cutting the light ray at its very narrowest portion; (b), that it will be impossible to get the shutter nearly as close to the lens with the short focal length objective as with the long one, therefore, the shutter must cut the light beam after it has spread considerably; (c) that it will take a wider blade to completely cover the light ray of B, Fig. 1, during a certain period of time than it will take to cover the light ray of A, Fig. 1, during the same period of time. It, therefore, follows that when an outside shutter is used the main blade of that shutter must be very considerably wider in order to eliminate travel ghost with the short focal length lens, and this is the answer to the whole proposition. The shutter blade must be matched to the objective.

It is an accepted optical proposition, well known to manufacturers, that in order to minimize flicker to its lowest possible point there must be at least three blades to a shutter and those three blades must be equal, or approximately equal in width. Now, while with the long focal length lens, and a minimum of lost motion in the shutter itself, it is possible to meet this condition, or very nearly meet it; it is not possible to do so with the short focal length lens, unless a very large percentage of the light is cut, and I also believe that even if this were done the flicker would still be quite pronounced, owing to excessive width of all three blades. The trouble with manufacturers is that the majority of them are putting out shutter blades utterly regardless of the conditions under which the machine will work, and they are building their shutter blades to work with at least tolerably short focal length objectives, and this, of course, gives abnormal flicker, which is entirely unnecessary if the machine happens to be working under conditions where a long, or at least a medium long, objective is used, say 4½ inches, or more.

I do not want to consume any more space on this matter than is necessary to make it clear, and I think you have grasped the idea by now. But, you say: "What is the remedy?" It is simple. Let the machine manufacturers make shutter blades to fit objectives, by half inches or inches. That is, let us say a blade for a three-inch, three and a half-inch, four-inch, four and a half-inch objective, etc., and stamp these blades with the e. f. of the lens they are to go with, supplying the dealer with an assortment. Then ship out the machine to the dealer without any shutter blade at all—just the shutter hub, and let the dealer, who will supply the lens, put on a shutter blade to suit the lens it is to work with; that is to say, if he finds the machine is to work with a five-inch e. f. objective, let him put on a shutter blade marked "5-inch e. f." This will, of course, necessitate the sending with each machine minute instructions for setting the shutter, but in this day and age almost every operator understands the shutter well enough to set it correctly, so that no serious trouble would be encountered on that score. This seems to me to be the logical and common sense thing to do. Exhibitors using very short focal length objectives must expect considerable flicker or considerable travel ghost, one of the two; but with conditions requiring a 4½ or greater e. f. lens, there is no excuse for either one, and neither should be tolerated.

From Toronto.

Mr. W. L. Johnston, Toronto, Canada, who is now acting as inspector for the Toronto Electric Light Company, but thinks of returning to operating later, writes as follows:

> Do you really contend that if a man understands his business thoroughly he can draw any such salary as stated in October 11th issue? I would like to say that the operator who stamps his name on the reel bands, etc., has a very definite idea of what he is doing. It is a scheme that might appeal to me also, if he had not grabbed it first. I recently had about 1,000 carbon ends to sharpen. In order to do this I procured, at a hardware store, an instrument called a "spoke rimmer." It is a tool which blacksmiths use to sharpen spokes to fit into the wheel rims, and is really nothing but a great, big pencil-sharpener, with a shank to fit into a brace. It costs 75 cents and sharpens the carbons perfectly, making the point at any angle you may desire.

So far as salaries are concerned there are a few, but an increasing number of exhibitors, who are willing to pay the price for high class work, and high class men in the operating room. Moving picture theaters are expanding in size; many of them now representing very large investments. The ideas of the managers of such houses necessarily expand also, and I think there is right now a $35 or $40 position awaiting every man who is qualified to and willing to fill it. But these jobs are not waiting for the man who lacks thorough knowledge of projection, who does not know how to get the right kind of a light, or how to maintain it, nor are they waiting for the man who does know all this, but is too lazy to apply it; who starts the motor-driven machine and then looks at the screen every minute or so to see whether the picture is still there or not.

Yes, brother, I mean exactly what I said. Perfect projection means real knowledge and very close application on the part of the operator every second of time while the picture is on the screen. It means a good sized observation port and a dark operating room so that the faint shadows can be seen the instant they appear; it means the operator's eye constantly on the screen; it means a wide variation in speed, and a careful attention to the details of action in the various scenes of the films. The man who can and will maintain a perfectly even and brilliant illumination on his screen, not sometimes, but all the time, without any shadows whatever, and who pays close attention to bringing out the full value of every scene by the close regulation of the speed of his machine can get, right now, from $35 to $40 a week, but—he must first build up and establish a reputation for this kind of work. The woods are literally crowded with hot air merchants, each and every one of whom will tell you that his projection is of the kind that I have indicated, but unless you want to lose faith in their veracity don't go into their theaters and sit through one show. This sounds like harsh criticism, but it is true, nevertheless. The spoke rimmer has been mentioned in the Department before, as being an excellent carbon sharpener, though this was quite a while ago.

The Questions.

Mr. A. C. Stewart, Rossland, British Columbia, Canada, sends in an excellent, but very brief answer to question No. 1, and remarks:

> I think the series of questions for operators is a grand idea—for the operator. I believe, however, it may prove the reverse for you, in that you have undertaken a task of surpassing magnitude. I am afraid you won't be able to carry it through. My idea would be to follow out the plan as outlined, but make it a club proposition, each member to pay dues of say, $1.00 or $2.00 a year to defray the expense of reading and considering the answers received. The Moving Picture World, as it now stands, is worth so much more than its subscription price that any additional service should certainly be pair for.

As to the club proposition—it would not do. The answers to the questions are beginning to come in. They are not very heavy—yet, because I am asking questions that only comparatively few operators have nerve enough to tackle. I expect, however, as time goes on that the work in connection with these questions will really be somewhat strenuous. But I will do the best I can, and will try and get by somehow. One very difficult feature is the matter of deciding which is the best answer. Take ques-No. 1. There are two or three of the answers which are very excellent. One might fairly say that all three are equally good. Now what am I going to do with a proposition of that kind? I have not the space to publish all three answers, and if I did it would simply be a repetition, so with those three I will simply have to pick out the one which appears to be the neatest and most carefully prepared, and let it go at that, placing the other two names in the Roll of Honor, with possibly a star before them, indicating a practically perfect answer.

I went into this thing with my eyes open. I have been considering it for something more than two years, and did intend to offer a series of prizes, amounting in all to about $2,000. I talked that matter over with the late J. P. Chalmers, and we gave up several hours to its consideration. It was finally laid aside, however, on account of the enormous amount of work entailed in a proposition of that kind. As it is now, I will feel repaid for the work in the knowledge of the good which I am very sure will be accomplished.

A Home-Made Dissolver.

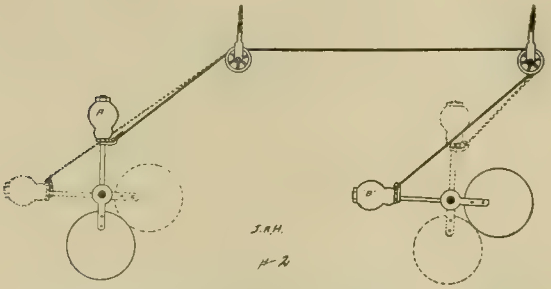
Mr. J. Roy Hunt, Birmingham, Ala., sends in some very excellent drawings of several ideas his fertile brain has evolved. These various things will be published as fast as we can spare the space.



The one shown this week is a home-made dissolver in the sense that it can be applied by the operator, in any operating room which has two machines. The action is plain and very simple. Just how it will work out in practice I cannot, of course, say of my own knowledge, but I am inclined to think that the dissolving effect might be quite perfect. The cord can be unhitched when the dissolver is not in use, so that the dowser may be used in the usual way. Mr. Hunt has our thanks for submitting these ideas, and submitting them in the form of very excellent drawings, done on tracing cloth. Usually it is necessary to re-draw the sketches sent in.

Interior Decorations.

Clarksburg, West Virginia (I cannot make out the name) writes:

> In October 11th issue, the gentleman from Texas asks for ideas for interior coloring for ceiling and walls. I have traveled a great deal in Europe and have run a theater in France, therefore, have observed many different schemes of decoration. In my own judgment a light gray or a pale white for the ceiling and a light orange or olive for the walls, are the softest and most favorable colors. In this part of the country these tints are to be found in most of the moving picture houses as well as in the regular theaters. They are pleasing to the eye. Where these tints are used the auditorium lights do not affect the picture as much as they would if lighter shades were substituted. Walls of too light a shade are objectionable, but if they are too dark then you must use an unnecessary amount of light in the auditorium in order to keep the illumination up to the standard so that people can find their way about. The colors I suggest for the ceiling and walls will be found satisfactory from all points of view.

Clarksburg said considerably more, but as he is not very fluent in the use of "American" I could not quite grasp his idea in full. However, the colors he names are, I think, a very pleasing combination. What I presume he means is orange and olive for the side walls, though the way it is written in his letter it appears to be an orange olive. One solid color would, however, hardly do, and the combination of orange and olive would certainly be pleasing, whether used in panel effect or otherwise, while pale gray ceilings would give excellent results with an indirect lighting system. I should be glad to hear from other correspondents on this important subject.

Screen Shadow Box.

While on a motorcycle exploration trip recently, I passed through Flushing, Long Island, and in the suburb of that little city I discovered the Murray Hill Theater. This house attracted my attention because, although located almost in the open country, it has a pretentious and pleasing front. I promptly clambered off my gasoline steed, and found that, although it was afternoon, a matinee was in progress and the house (10 cents admission) was fairly well filled. As to where they came from, you can search me, but they were there all right. There was no doubt about that. And I was informed that at night the house (seating capacity 299) was usually packed.

Mr. Fred J. Dollinger, manager, was pleased to meet the editor and showed him around with much pride. The operating room is large and very well ventilated indeed. It is perhaps as excellent an operating room as I have seen anywhere, taking everything into consideration. The equipment was a Power's 6A. Projection was in charge of Mr. Joseph Dorothy, who was putting a very good picture on the screen, though at times faint shadows would show, due, at least to some extent, I think, to too much light in the operating room.

The thing to which Manager Dollinger especially called my attention, however, was the shadow box surrounding the screen, the same consisting of a flaring frame of black, something like two or three feet in width, set at an angle of 45 degrees to the screen. Manager Dollinger says that before the installation of this shadow box there was much reflection from the screen to the ceiling and walls of the auditorium. He also says he discovered the fact that in order to be effective in stopping this, the shadow box must be set at the right angle and be of the right width to fit each individual case, according to the size of the picture and the length of the throw. He says he tried several different widths and angles without effect, but persisted until he got the right width and the right angle to suit his case, whereupon the reflection disappeared, and the projection was very greatly improved.

Here seems to be something of large value. Many managers and operators have been annoyed, and the projection more or less injured, through the reflection of light from the screen to the ceiling and walls. If it is possible by such a shadow box to eliminate this, then Manager Dollinger deserves the thanks of all those who will benefit through his discovery. In building such a box, however, it must be remembered that, as has been stated, the width of the box and the angle of its sides to the screen must be determined by experiments in each individual case. Lusterless black cloth is best to use for the purpose.

A Hot One.

The Feature Film Service Company, Saskatoon, Sask., Canada, contributes the following letter:

> Our road man recently visited the town of Hanna, Alberta, which was celebrating its first annual anniversary with a "Stampede" (whatever in thunder that stands for.—Ed.) The population of Hanna is 400 (when they are all there) and they have a new moving picture theater seating 300, the equipment of which consists of a new Power's Six projector and a Fairbanks-Morse engine and generator. Our man had the "pleasure" of going to the local print shop and setting up the dodger describing our service, as the editor was on the Stampede Committee, and his relation to the shop somewhat similar to that of Will Cressey to his Vermont theater, when he said: "Whatever is, I am; what I am not, ain't." After setting up the bill our man was unable to coax the two h. p. engine to run, so had to "kick" the press, while a country "hoe-down" was in progress upstairs and the dust sifting down through the cracks in the floor onto the ink plates. Well, the attendance was 230 paid admissions, or $55.25; the prices being 15 and 25 cents. Some show town!

Not Practical.

Mr. R. W. Mackler, New York City, suggests that, while the questions will be of great benefit, it will be better to let the men dig out the answers for themselves. He says he went down to the World office to get a copy of the Handbook in order to secure its author's autograph, but the aforesaid author was out (shame on him—the author. Ed.)

Unless I publish the correct solution to the questions how are you going to know whether you have found the right answer or not? I do not intend to publish the answers until ample time has been had to do all the digging necessary. The answer to Question No. 1 will appear a little more than a month after the question was published. I will be glad to autograph your Handbook, if you care to bring it down to this office and leave it with a memorandum in my letter box.

You Can Search Me.

Marianna, Ark., has a difficulty which I think I will have to pass up to our readers. He sets it forth as follows:

> Am using 110 volts, 133 cycle current through a Fort Wayne Compensarc; projecting a 14-foot picture at 81 feet on a gold fibre screen. The light is good, and the focus of the picture sharp, but there is a sort of flashing at all speeds, which I cannot eliminate from the picture. There is no travel ghost, and I cannot understand it. I suppose you think I am an incompetent operator who is trying to pull through with your assistance, but such is not the case. I never ran up against such a problem as this before, and do not believe you did either.

I never did. You have made the mistake of not describing that flashing effect in detail. The only thing I can think of appears to be ridiculous, viz: that your screen is not mounted perfectly tight and sways slightly. You will have to describe the effect very closely and in much detail. As it is, I cannot offer you any satisfaction. Can any of our readers do anything to help?

Synchronism of the Phonograph with Pictures.

When the Edison Company brought out its much advertised talking pictures, the personal mail of the editor, as well as the department mail, was literally flooded with inquiries as to the practicability of the invention. Inasmuch, however, as the talking pictures were not to be used for release for use in moving picture theaters, I saw no reason why I should take issue with the proposition in print. Now, however, I think it is incumbent upon me, and is in fact a duty which this Department owes to those who depend upon it, to set forth our views in this matter and give our reasons for certain conclusions that have been made.

In the judgment of the editor of this department the synchronism of a phonograph with moving picture films will never be successfully accomplished so long as the synchronism depends to any extent whatever on the operator. I base this conclusion on the fact that the synchronism must be, to all intents and purposes, perfect, or else the illusion is lost and the whole thing fails. Concluding this to be fact, it may be taken as further fact that there is no operator who can for any length of time maintain a perfect synchronism between a projector and a phonograph. By intense application he may do it for a short time—a very short time, but I make the statement that there are very few, if any men, who can maintain perfect synchronism throughout 500 feet of ordinary film

Bear in mind that I mean by this—perfect synchronism. If the voice even is so much as two pictures (⅛ of a second) ahead of, or behind the action, then synchronism is not perfect and the fault is discernible.

In my judgment synchronism is only a practical proposition where the synchronism is entirely automatic. This kind of synchronism is practical, but it presupposes a perfect film—that is to say, a film from which nothing whatever has been removed. In effect this means that if a film is torn in two, and even if so much as one picture is lost, that picture must be replaced. Given a perfect film I see no reason why we cannot synchronize the phonograph with the moving picture. It is purely a mechanical proposition and undoubtedly can be successfully handled, but it means that the phonograph is only available for the first run films which have not been in any way injured by having pictures removed, or patches made therein. If the phonograph cannot be made to thus automatically synchronize with a perfect film then, in my opinion, the film and the phonograph will never be successfully united.

Mr. Edison is one of the world's foremost men. In ordinary things I would not, for one moment, dream of disputing almost any conclusion he might arrive at, but in this matter I believe that Mr. Edison is himself perfectly aware of the correctness of my conclusions. Nor do I believe that the Wizard of Orange has ever himself made an assertion which could be construed as disputing any assertion I have herein made.

I do believe that with the marvelously perfect phonograph Mr. Edison has but recently completed, there is a distinct field for its synchronizing with first run films. The phonograph itself gives an astonishing lifelike reproduction, without any scratching sound whatever, and I believe that with an automatic synchronism and first run films in which no rain marks help to destroy the illusion the effect would be decidedly pleasing and at least passably lifelike.

Now, please do not jump to the conclusion that this is written with any idea or desire to tramp on anyone's toes, or knock anyone's schemes. It is simply a plain straightforward statement of the thing as I see it, and I trust that it will be thus accepted.

Carbon Soaking Again.

Mr. W. S. James, Camden, New Jersey, contributes the following:

> On page 260, October 18th issue, you mentioned slight coloring of the light as a possible aid to projection. I submit the following for what it is worth. Using 60 amperes through an economizer, I suggest using ¾ cored carbon on top and a ⅝ cored below, with the lower carbon prepared as follows: In an ordinary pail of water dissolve two pounds of common salt and one pound of salammoniac and soak the carbons in this solution for one week, after which, dry them thoroughly. This gives the light a slightly yellow, or pale orange, tinge. The treated carbons will needle slightly, but I think this is favorable, giving an arc very much like d. c. The treated carbons will have to be filed to enable you to strike an arc with a new set. I suggest that those using the semi-reflecting type screen and d. c. obtain from a photographic supply house a ray filter, at a cost of from $1.50 to $2.00. These filters may be had in five or six densities, varying from almost clear glass to a deep yellow. They give no distortion whatever, which you would very likely get by putting a plain glass in the lens opening of the operating room. When using these filters, however, the operator must be right on the job, since any imperfection will show up worse than when using the straight light.
> I have two methods for writing on a screen. In one the hand appears and writes in black, and with the other the writing alone appears, in white. The latter works up to 167 feet successfully, using a 4.4 lens. If any "23-carat operator" wants to waste 2 cents on postage, so that he can install it in his lamp-house, I will forward him sketch of the same.
>
> Camden is a licensed town, but there are $7.00 operators (?) here, who are licensed, and some of them are only 16 years old. Such conditions as this make one opposed to the publication of the answers to questions, since I do not believe in handing out information to crank turners. Publish the questions by all means, and if any operator wants to know the answers badly enough, let him look them up in the free libraries. As to the small town man who does not have the facilities for obtaining the knowledge, why not, for a nominal sum, send him the answers after he has proven he is following the game? In this way you would be helping the man who wants to keep up to date, without helping those who are not deserving.
> San Diego writes about examinations and I agree with him as to most of them being merely a farce, of which the Philadelphia examination is a shining example. I will wind up this, my first to the Department in all the years I have been "flirting with the celluloid," with a request that you start a discussion as to getting color effects on the screen with ordinary black and white pictures. This is a matter I have been working on for several years with only sufficient result to warrant continuing the pursuit of this elusive phase of projection.

As to the questions, I have already issued my ultimatum on that proposition. I do not think the publication of the answers is going to hurt anyone, and I do think it will have a most excellent effect all round. Your carbon soaking is a variation of the scheme of the salt soaking stunt, which was published in the Department long ago, and was very thoroughly experimented with. Your plan of adding salammoniac may be an improvement. Personally, I think the soaking is worth while. I would like to have a sketch of that slide writer myself, and I won't publish it if you prefer not. Those who desire to secure this sketch from Brother James should address him at the Lyric Theater, Broadway and Newton Avenue, Camden, N. J. As to the color effect, I doubt if there is anything in it except possibly as worked out by Brother Woods, of San Francisco. In his scheme a colored blade is used on the machine in place of the regular shutter. This does not color the picture, but it does add to the black and white value to a very large extent. The scheme I suggested for putting colored glass in the observation port is not designed to color the picture, but merely to add sufficient yellow to neutralize the harshness of the light. I shall be glad, however, to have the result of any experiments operators may make with the color scheme. Come again neighbor James.

Dislikes His Own Show.

Mr. D. C. Doyle, proprietor of the Gem Theater, Minden, Neb., sets forth his intense dislike of his own show, as follows:

> I have only been in the exhibiting business since last February, and realize I do not know a thing about it yet. Have had competitors since the latter part of July, and at the present writing have put two men out of business who claim to know the moving pictures from the ground up. The population of Minden is 1,500, which is just about enough for one show to exist on and supply its owner with a fair living. The crowd has been sticking to my house in spite of the fact that the other man ran four reels, with a feature every night, as against my three. My machines are two Exhibition Model Edisons wired in multiple, pulling 15 amperes through an old Viascope rheostat. You will probably laugh at the idea of an arc pulling only 15 amperes, but the laugh would be on you if you could see the picture we put on the screen. The current is direct. The picture is clear and absolutely flickerless and steady as a rock. It is 14 feet at 70. I have a 9 h.p. Alamo gas engine and a 5 k.w. dynamo which I use for matinees, there being no day current here. I subscribed to the World last May, and do not know how I could have remained in business without the aid of the Projection Department.

Well, brother Doyle, I see I am going to have to stick a small pin into your big balloon. Either you run your pictures very fast, or else they are not absolutely flickerless, because the old style inside two-wing shutter of the Edison Exhibition Model does not produce an absolutely flickerless picture, nor does any other inside shutter machine produce one. Moreover, while it is possible to get a good 14-foot picture with 15 amperes of current, it is far from being a brilliant picture. If it was put up against a picture projected at 40 amperes d. c. you would change your mind about its excellence. However, you are no doubt giving a good show for a small town, and the fact that the crowd stays with you is proof of that, therefore, congratulations. The weakness of your light explains the absence of objectionable flicker.

Condenser Breakage.

Mr. R. D. Marshall, Wilmington, N. C., writes:

> I have been on the crank for five years (gee, you must be an awful crank by this time.—Ed.) and yet I find there is always something more to learn. The Department, of which I am a constant reader, is a great help to us all. I have noticed upon several occasions reference to trouble with condenser breakage. I had that difficulty until I placed a little piece of asbestos between the spring and the lens, so that the lens does not touch the metal. I now have a pair of condensers that I have been using every day for several months. Moreover, it cannot be said there is no draught on them, as we have two ventilators 3 x 5 feet. I have a scheme for keeping films. Had a box made, large enough to hold three reels. In it are three compartments. At the top edge of the partitions I have a slide-way for a square piece of screen wire the same size as the box, and on this wire I place a damp piece of cloth and then slide the wire into place. I have tried this out and it gives great results, but one should be careful to see that the cloth is not wet enough to drip. We have two Power's Six-A machines and they are certainly dandies. We are using what we might term the troublesome double throw, and in starting on new carbons it gives us a great deal of difficulty, also bad light. However, I have struck a good scheme; burn about six or eight pairs of carbons when the show is not running. This gives one a fairly good light to start with. I find it very easy when threading my machine to hold top loop on finger with the gate open and moving frame carriage up and down so as to frame the picture. Do you think that a scheme to cover the cone on the lamp-house when running slides would be worth patenting? It works automatically, and you do not see the slide move on the screen.

Your scheme for stopping condenser breakage has been set forth in the Department several times. It is used by many operators and can be said to be successful, or at least the separation of the lens from the metal by means of asbestos very greatly reduces condenser breakage. Your scheme for keeping the films damp is a good one, and should be used in every operating room. I do not understand what you mean by the "troublesome double throw," unless it is that your lamps are wired in multiple, in which case your crater burning plan is excellent. No, I do not think it would pay to patent that kind of a proposition; in fact, I am sure it would not.

Some Very Interesting Data.

Mr. Martin next deals with projection screens as follows:

> The low intensity of illumination, which is less than 0.4 foot candles on the average motion picture screen, immediately leads to the conclusion that improving the same is largely a matter of increasing the intensity of the light source, and the efficiency of the lens system. This conclusion is also apparently substantiated by the fact that the difference in the efficiencies of available reflecting surfaces allows of no great increase in reflecting efficiency. However, due to the fact that the eye is very much more susceptible to changes in illumination at low intensities than at those ordinarily experienced, it is possible to apparently double the screen illumination by increasing the efficiency of the reflecting surface only 10%. In an effort to satisfy a public demand for more wholesome and better lighted surroundings, there has been developed a number of improved screens. There are two distinct types of these screens: one consists of a smooth surface dressed with aluminum powder and lacquer; the other is a dressing of the whitest and most opaque paint obtainable, applied to a smooth surface or to the back of a large piece of plate glass. The aluminum dressed screen closely approaches the efficiency of a low grade amalgam backed mirror and unless the surface is pebbled or roughened, the image on the screen is not entirely discernible to a spectator sitting to one side, without the angle of incidence. This screen must also be mounted on a perfectly flat plane to avoid a serious glare and on account of the metallic tint giving color distortion. A sheet of plate glass, backed with an opaque white surface, although costly, is the ideal screen. This construction gives a perfectly smooth surface, fine grained and gives the highest efficiency allowable in securing satisfactory definition. White oilcloth stretched on a rigid frame is less durable, but almost as satisfactory.

When brother Martin says that the difference in the efficiencies of available reflecting surfaces allows of no great increase in reflecting efficiency, I cannot agree with him, providing he means by this that there is not much difference in the reflective powers of various screen surfaces. As between the cloth or plaster surface or the properly made aluminum or metallic surface screen, and the ground surface mirror screen there is, in my judgment, no comparison; the mirror surface has a far greater reflective power. If, however, Mr. Martin means that the reflecting power which can be used to advantage is limited, then I do agree with him. I should very much like to have brother Martin set his views and ideas on this subject forth at greater length in the Department, if he will be so obliging. As to the statement that a piece of plate glass backed with an opaque white surface is the ideal screen, I could neither agree or disagree, since I have never seen that kind of a proposition tried out. However, if it is not more efficient than white oilcloth, then I think Mr. Martin is incorrect, since a properly made mirror screen should, I believe, be much more efficient, even though giving a somewhat greater out of focus effect when viewed at a heavy angle.

To Test Your Ingenuity.

Just to see how many of you can work a simple, little puzzle, I will give you the following: Not long ago I was in an operating room in Brooklyn, and in making an adjustment on the machine for the operator, I dropped a small screw which flew over into one corner of the room. There was no extension light cord, and the corner of the room was dark. Neither one of us had a match, and anyhow the use of a match in the operating room would have been a compounding of arson, bigamy, horse thievery and trigonometry all rolled into one. What were we to do? Glancing around I saw a small ———— hanging on the wall. Eureka! (Eureka means, I have found it. It sounds mysterious to put it that way, therefore, eureka goes). Seizing the ————, I held it at the proper angle in ———— ———— in front of the ————, whereupon the obscure corner was flooded with the brilliance of noon day and the missing screw discovered.

This is not much of a puzzle, but it brings out a little trick that might be of considerable value sometime. Let us see how many of you can fill in the missing words.

A New Descriptive Catalog.

Mr. C. D. Wheeler, Advertising Department, Fort Wayne Electric Works, Fort Wayne, Ind., forwards us a very neatly gotten up little publication describing the various Fort Wayne current saving devices, including sign and house lighting transformers. The little booklet contains 47 pages and can be had by addressing the Advertising Department, Fort Wayne Electric Works, Fort Wayne, Indiana.

I am particularly interested in the voltmeter and ammeter panel shown on page 21. It is something that every operating room ought by all means be equipped with. Its addition to the operating room, provided it be installed beside the observation port, right in front of the operator, will not only enable the careful operator to secure better results, but will also enable him to effect a very considerable reduction in his current consumption.

Can't Get Results.

Millbrook, New York, questions Lodi, California, as follows:

> I tried Lodi's receipe for transferring newspaper cuts, etc., to a slide, and, though I tried it different ways, including the following of his directions closely, secured no results. Please ask Lodi if the paper is to be left on the glass under pressure until it dries, or anything like that.

Well, Lodi, I guess it is up to you. Please come across with the desired information. Millbrook intimates that he is inclined to think that you are kidding us, but I do not believe so. You probably have left out some important item in the directions.
